

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. # HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

APPOINTED TO MEET 5 MARCH, 1874, AND THENCE CONTINUED
THE REIGN OF*

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FIRST VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 8th February, 1876.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been Prorogued successively from the 13th day of August, 1875, to the 29th day of October; thence to the 15th day of December; thence to Tuesday, the 8th day of February, 1876, met this day for the Despatch of Business.

The Session of PARLIAMENT was opened by THE QUEEN in Person.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Her Majesty, being seated on the Throne, adorned with Her Crown and Regal Ornaments, and attended by Her Officers of State, (the Lords being in their robes)—commanded the Yeoman

VOL. CCXXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Usher of the Black Rod, through the Deputy Lord Great Chamberlain, to let the Commons know "It is Her Majesty's Pleasure they attend Her immediately, in this House."

Who being come, with their Speaker;

—THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Commands, delivered Her Majesty's Speech as follows:—

" My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"It is with much satisfaction that I again resort to the advice and assistance of my Parliament.

"My relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be of a cordial character.

"The insurrectionary movement, which, during the last six months, has been maintained in the Turkish Provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and which the troops of the Sultan have, up to the present time, been unable to repress, has excited the attention and interest of the great European Powers. I have considered it my duty not to stand aloof from the efforts now being made by allied and friendly Governments to bring about a pacification of the disturbed districts, and I have accordingly, while respecting the independence of the Porte, joined in urging on the Sultan the expediency of adopting such measures of administrative reform as may remove all reasonable cause of discontent on the part of his Christian subjects.

"I have agreed to purchase, subject to your sanction, the shares which belonged to the Khedive of Egypt in the Suez Canal, and I rely with confidence on your enabling me to complete a transaction in which the public interests are deeply involved.

"The representations which I addressed to the Chinese Government, as to the attack made in the course of last year on the Expedition sent from Burmah to the Western Provinces of China, have been received in a friendly spirit. The circumstances of that lamentable outrage are now the subject of an inquiry, in which I have thought it right to request that a Member of my Diplomatic Service should take part. I await the result of this inquiry in the firm conviction that it will be so conducted as to lead to the discovery and punishment of the offenders.

"Papers on all these subjects will be laid before you.

"I am deeply thankful for the uninterrupted health which my dear Son, the Prince of Wales, has enjoyed during his journey through India. The hearty affection with which he has been received by my Indian subjects of all classes and races assures me that they are happy under my rule, and loyal to my throne. At the time that the direct Government of my Indian Empire was transferred to the Crown, no formal addition was made to the style and titles of the Sovereign. I have deemed the present a fitting opportunity for supplying this omission, and a Bill upon the subject will be presented to you.

"The humane and enlightened policy consistently pursued by this country in putting an end to slavery within her own dependencies, and in suppressing the Slave Trade throughout the world, makes it important that the action of British National ships in the territorial waters of Foreign States should be in harmony with these great principles. I have, therefore, given directions for the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into all Treaty engagements and other International obligations bearing upon this subject, and all instructions from time to time issued to my naval officers, with a view to ascertain whether any steps ought to be taken to secure for my ships and their Commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty.

"A Bill will be laid before you for punishing Slave Traders who are subjects of Native Indian Princes.

"The affairs of my Colonial Empire, the general prosperity of which has continued to advance, have received a large share of my attention.

Papers of importance and interest will soon be in your hands showing the proceedings with respect to a Conference of the South African Colonies and States.

"The murder of a high officer of the Straits Settlements whilst acting as Resident in a neighbouring Malay State, and the disorders ensuing on that outrage, have demanded the interference of my troops. I trust that the operations, which have been ably and energetically conducted, though not without the loss of some valuable lives, have restored order, and re-established the just influence and authority of this country.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have directed the Estimates of the year to be prepared and presented to you without delay.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"Bills for regulating the Ultimate Tribunal of Appeal for the United Kingdom, and for the amendment of the Merchant Shipping Laws, will be immediately submitted to you.

"Legislation will be proposed relating to the Universities and to Primary Education.

"Your attention will be called also to the Acts relating to the Inclosure of Commons, and to a measure for promoting economy and efficiency in the management of Prisons, and at the same time effecting a relief of local burthens.

"Other important measures, as the time of the Session permits, will be introduced to your notice; and I pray that your deliberations may, under the Divine blessing, result in the happiness and contentment of my people."

And then Her Majesty was pleased to retire.

And the Commons withdrew.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

The QUEEN'S SPEECH reported by The LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN, in moving an humble Address to Her Majesty, in answer to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne, said:—My Lords, the circumstances under which Parliament this year assembles will be viewed by your Lordships and the nation at large with a sense of loyal satisfaction. It is a matter of congratulation to every subject of Her Majesty that, after an interval of several years, Her Majesty has been again enabled to inaugurate the proceedings of Parliament by Her presence. The fact that Her Majesty has to-day appeared on the Throne in your Lordships' House may be taken as a gratifying indication that She is still favoured with that health and energy which for so many years have enabled Her to perform the duties of a Throne so illustrious as Hers. This circumstance is made still more gratifying by contrasting the present circumstances of the Royal Family with those which were the main cause of Her Majesty's absence last year. A Member of Her Majesty's Family was only then beginning to recover from a dangerous illness—I am happy to say that Prince Leopold is now entirely re-established in health.

My Lords, I will now proceed to make a few observations on the topics adverted to in the Speech from the Throne: but, before doing so, I will bespeak an exercise of that indulgence which your Lordships are accustomed to extend to noble Lords in my position. Her Majesty's most gracious Speech commences with a reference to Foreign Affairs. Intelligence of those affairs is always important, but it will be received on this occasion with special interest. The state of our foreign relations has been, perhaps, the most prominent subject in the public mind during the Recess, and it is therefore most satisfactory to hear that our relations with Foreign Powers continue to be of the most cordial character. It will be in the recollection of your Lordships that some time ago a revolt broke out in Bosnia and Herzegovina. That revolt was at first of small proportions; but it gradually gained strength, partly because of the inefficiency of the armed forces of Turkey, and partly from the financial collapse of the Turkish Government. Under those circumstances intervention on the part of the Powers of Europe was deemed expedient—indeed, became inevitable; and if there must be interference—for that is the proper word—it was clear that such interference must, in the natural course of things, emanate from Austria, because the frontier territory of Austria in the neighbourhood of the disturbed Provinces being inhabited by an excitable people, was endangered by the hostile operations in its neighbourhood. I believe that the conduct of Austria in this matter has been characterized by energy, temperance, and discretion; and the course which has been taken by Her Majesty's Government in reference to that action will, I think, meet with general approval. In the Speech from the Throne, Her Majesty says—

“I have considered it my duty not to stand aloof from the efforts now being made by allied and friendly Governments to bring about a pacification of the disturbed districts.”

That is an attitude of a kind which does not unduly commit this country to any definite line of future policy. It requires but little reflection to show that had any other course been adopted grave difficulties might have ensued. Had this country stood aloof from all representations made to Turkey, we might have been accused of an indifference which savoured of cowardice. On the other hand, if the alternative of that course had been adopted—had this country recommended Turkey to concede what was asked by the other Powers, a responsibility might have attached to this country which would have been unnecessary and which certainly would not have been desirable. I think there is strong reason to hope that what has been done by England and the other Powers will lead to peace in the disturbed Provinces and to the establishment of religious toleration for the Christians who inhabit them.

My Lords, the next reference in the Royal Speech is to another topic of much importance and one which has excited much public interest. It will be remembered that two years ago much interest was felt in reference to the position of this country in regard to the Suez Canal, and it was the subject of a discussion in your Lordships' House. On that occasion the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs said that there was no opportunity of acquiring the Canal from M. Lesseps and the shareholders. But in the course of the last autumn, owing to the financial embarrassments of the Viceroy of Egypt, circumstances were altered, and an opportunity did present itself by which England was enabled to acquire a definite and tangible position in respect of the undertaking. It must be acknowledged that it was not a satisfactory state of things that while England contributed three-quarters of the entire traffic of the Canal she should have no voice in the management of the Canal except what she might be supposed to derive from vague claims and indirect interests,

Now, however, this country is in a position to represent one-half of the proprietary interest. The opportunity for attaining that desirable end arose with some suddenness, and it had to be at once seized or allowed to pass. As your Lordships are aware it was not allowed to pass, and I believe the opinion of Parliament and the country to be that the conduct of the Government in this matter has been characterized by energy, by diligence, and promptitude. The Papers on the subject will be laid before Parliament, and I venture to think that the action of Her Majesty's Government will be endorsed by Parliament as thoroughly as it has been approved by the country. Your Lordships will observe that while acting with decision for themselves, Her Majesty's Government have duly respected the constitutional forms and rights of Parliament, in accordance with which both Houses will be afforded an opportunity of expressing their judgment on the matter.

My Lords, the paragraph in the Royal Speech having reference to the affairs of China and to the expedition sent from Burmah to the Western Provinces of China will be welcome to all who remember the threatening aspect of affairs in that quarter at the end of last Session. The murder of Mr. Margary will be made the subject of grave inquiry, and there can be no doubt that it will not be allowed to drop before satisfaction has been received, and reparation made for the atrocious assault made upon our Envoy last year.

My Lords, I am sure that the passage of the Speech which refers to the success of the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to India will meet with a loyal response. It is a cause of thankfulness that the health of His Royal Highness has been preserved, notwithstanding the trying climate of India and the energy which has characterized the movements of the Prince during his tour.

I now come to a subject which has excited the public mind very much during the Vacation, and respecting which much misapprehension—or rather, I should say, uncertainty—still prevails. When I speak of uncertainty in connection with Slavery, your Lordships will understand me as confining myself to the legal aspect of the question. As to Slavery and the Slave Trade, the attitude of the country has long been fixed and certain, and the attitude of the Government in respect of both is also fixed; but there is uncertainty as regards the legal aspect of the question, which it is well should be ascertained and settled in a positive manner, and I am sure your Lordships will concur with me in thinking that the Government have done well to refer that part of the question to the careful consideration of a Royal Commission. It would indeed be strange that anyone should suppose that on the question of Slavery itself there is any uncertainty in the minds of a Government which has concluded a treaty with the Seyyid of Zanzibar that promises to result in the complete extinction of slavery within the territories of that Potentate, and which has brought about the annexation of Fiji—one of the objects of this annexation being the suppression of a species of slavery which existed in those parts.

Her Majesty's gracious Speech next refers to the Conference with respect to the Confederation of the South African Colonies. There is much reason to hope that what has been proposed by the Government will have the effect of placing on a better basis the relations of the several races which inhabit those regions.

My Lords, it is a matter for congratulation that the outbreak in the Malay Peninsula seems to have been effectually quelled.

Among the subjects on which legislation is promised in Her Majesty's Speech, one of the most important is that of the Merchant Shipping Laws. Scarcely a Session has passed within the last 30 or 40 years without some legislation on that subject. The measure passed last Session was admittedly a temporary one; but it affords a basis for satisfactory legislation of a permanent character, and the present time is one eminently favourable for satisfactory legislation. There has been time for the various interests concerned to consider the matter with calmness, and your Lordships will all agree that it would be impossible that any permanent legislation on the subject could be satisfactory if it did not, to some extent at least, receive the co-operation of all the interests involved in such legislation. It will not appear surprising that some difficulty should be felt in dealing with the question if we consider what has been the advance of our shipping trade. From the Board of Trade Returns I find that in 1846 the British vessels engaged in the foreign trade amounted to about 6,000,000 of tons, and that in 1874 they amounted to 30,000,000 of tons. These are exclusive of the British ships engaged in the coasting trade. My Lords, in speaking on this subject, it is impossible not to refer to the zeal shown by an individual in the cause of our seafaring men. I believe that even those who hold that the figures and allegations of fact brought forward by Mr. Plimsoll are not borne out by the facts of the case, are not disposed to deny to that Gentleman a grateful recognition for having kept alive the question, and having brought forward circumstances of much importance in connection with a discussion of our Shipping Laws.

Coming to the paragraph in the Royal Speech which has reference to Education, I will remind your Lordships that the legislative changes already brought about with respect to our Universities have been carried out by the authorities, and it cannot be doubted that whatever further changes Parliament may think it necessary to make, if conceived in a moderate spirit, will be favourably received, and will be carried out in the best manner possible. As regards Primary Education—a subject which in recent Sessions has been much discussed by both Houses of Parliament—I have only to observe that your Lordships will see with satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government have lost no time in the endeavour to complete the legislation already in operation on that important matter.

The Inclosure of Commons unquestionably is a matter which demands the attention of Parliament. It appears that some machinery is necessary; but I feel sure that the Government do not intend any interference with the local management of commons, which for many reasons must be the best.

Any measure for promoting economy and efficiency in the management of Prisons, and at the same time effecting a relief of Local Burdens, must, I presume, be of a financial character, and will, therefore, be dealt with mainly in the other House of Parliament; and, consequently, I will do no more than call the attention of your Lordships to the fact that these subjects have not been forgotten in the Queen's Speech. Experience has shown that successive Governments find the greatest difficulty in passing all the measures proposed for the Session in the Speech from the Throne. For that reason it appears to me that one of the most satisfactory features of the Speech addressed to Parliament to-day is that it does not promise too many measures; but if the measures which it does promise are passed in the present Session, then the time of Parliament will have been well spent.

My Lords, I will conclude by moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for Her Majesty's most Gracious Speech from the Throne, as follows:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"WE, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the most gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty's relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be of a cordial character.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has considered it your duty not to stand aloof from the efforts now being made by allied and friendly Governments to bring about a pacification of the disturbed districts of Bosnia and Herzegovina; and that Your Majesty has accordingly, while respecting the independence of the Porte, joined in urging on the Sultan the expediency of adopting such measures of administrative reform as may remove all reasonable cause of discontent on the part of his Christian subjects.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has agreed to purchase, subject to the sanction of Parliament, the shares which belonged to the Khedive of Egypt in the Suez Canal.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the representations which Your Majesty addressed to the Chinese Government, as to the attack made in the course of last year on the Expedition sent from Burmah to the Western Provinces of China, have been received in a friendly spirit, and that the circumstances of that lamentable outrage are now the subject of an inquiry.

The Earl of Aberdeen

"We rejoice to learn that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has enjoyed uninterrupted health during his journey through India; and that the hearty affection with which he has been received by Your Majesty's Indian subjects is an assurance to Your Majesty that they are happy under Your Majesty's rule, and loyal to Your throne.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for reminding us that at the time that the direct Government of Your Majesty's Indian Empire was transferred to the Crown, no formal addition was made to the style and titles of the Sovereign, and we rejoice to learn that Your Majesty deems the present a fitting opportunity for supplying this omission.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has given directions for the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into all Treaty engagements and other International obligations bearing upon the subject of the Slave Trade, and the action of British national ships in territorial waters of Foreign States, with a view to ascertain whether any steps ought to be taken to secure for Your Majesty's ships and their Commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that a Bill will be laid before us for punishing Slave Traders who are the subjects of native Indian Princes.

"We rejoice to learn that the general prosperity of Your Majesty's Colonial Empire has continued to advance.

"We join with Your Majesty in trusting that the operations conducted by Your Majesty's troops in Malay have restored order and re-established the just influence and authority of this country.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the measures which may be submitted to us, and that we earnestly join in Your Majesty's prayer that our deliberations may, under the Divine blessing, result in the happiness and contentment of Your Majesty's people."

THE EARL OF ELLESMERE — My Lords, in seconding the Motion of my noble Friend who has just sat down, I have in the first place to solicit the indulgence of your Lordships on this my first occasion of addressing you. My Lords, it gives me great pleasure to commence my observations by joining with my noble Friend the Mover of this Address, in expressing satisfaction that

Her Majesty has been able to come down and in person to open this Session of Parliament. I think that perhaps the most important part of the Speech from the Throne is that relating to the insurrection in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It seems to me to threaten the gravest results. It must be remembered that the state of things as regards the East is very different in 1876 from what it was in 1853 and 1854, when disturbances in the Northern parts of Turkey were raging. At that time Russia was adopting a policy of her own. Now, when an insurrection in Bosnia and Herzegovina has arisen, Austria, to whose Government the insurrection is naturally the cause of great uneasiness, has come forward and, acting in concert with Russia and with the German Empire, which did not exist in 1854, has recommended to the Porte measures calculated to restore peace in the disturbed Provinces. To that diplomatic movement Her Majesty's Government have given their assistance, and the reply given by the Porte is a sufficient answer to those who said that Her Majesty's Government should have held aloof. As to the purchase of the shares of the Suez Canal, the proceeding of Her Majesty's Government is so exceptional in its nature, that without hearing an explanation of all the circumstances attending that course of action, it would be hardly proper to offer any opinion at all; but, as has been pointed out by the noble Earl who moved the Address, this is not the first occasion on which the question has arisen of England obtaining an influence in the management of the Canal by the purchase of shares. The noble Earl has also pointed out that if Her Majesty's Government had not purchased at once, when the opportunity arose, that opportunity would have quickly passed away—the Khedive would soon have found ready purchasers for those shares. As regards the paragraph in the Royal Speech having reference to China, our diplomatic proceedings in relation to the event alluded to in that paragraph have been perfectly successful, and have given one further proof that England is always ready and willing to defend British subjects, and demand reparation for wrongs inflicted upon them, and if the expedition now on the way to Yunnan should be finally successful, I think the prestige of England in those regions will be materially increased. If the news I read the other day be true—namely, that the Chinese official in the Province where Mr. Margary had been murdered is recalled—it will show that the Chinese Government is inclined to do justice in the case. It must be a source of gratification to every one that the visit to India of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has been a marked success, and that the health of His Royal Highness has not suffered from the trying duties which he has performed in such a climate. The outbursts of loyalty with which the Prince has been greeted in all parts of India which he has visited are in the highest degree satisfactory, and now this country awaits the return of His Royal Highness in unimpaired health and with increased knowledge of the great Empire over which at a future day—may that day be distant—he will be called upon to rule. My Lords, I will not enter into the question of the Slave Circular, because the whole subject is to be investigated by a Royal Commission. I will merely observe that the actual state of the law is to be regarded as most unsatisfactory and ambiguous, and that therefore it is easy to understand that at times the position of naval commanders must be a very difficult one. It will be an advantage to have a uniform method laid down for dealing with fugitive slaves—regard being, of course, had to exceptional cases. I will not anticipate what may be the conclusions of the Royal Commission, but it would be absurd to suppose that in this year of 1876 any Englishman can have a bias in favour of Slavery. As regards the South African Colonies, I will only allude to the affairs of Natal, and only to say that it was natural that the Government of this country after a disturbance had been put down in a colony should recommend measures to prevent a recurrence of such a misfortune, and that some uniform principle should be laid down for dealing with the Native tribes. The first proposition of the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies did not meet with the approval of all the statesmen of the South African Colonies; but I think that, on reflection, they will see that it would be attended with great advantages even if they did not see all the benefits which were likely to arise from the Confederation. The Royal Speech promises a Bill for regulating the Ultimate Tribunal of Appeal. That is a rather abstruse question, and your Lordships will pardon me for not going into it; but as to the Bill which we are promised for the amendment of the Merchant Shipping Law, I may refer to the fact that on receiving a deputation which waited on him a few days ago, the First Lord of the Treasury said Her Majesty's Government were determined that another Session should not pass without legislation on the subject, and this declaration will, I think, be received with satisfaction by your Lordships and the country. As to Education, I may be allowed to express a hope that any measure introduced by the Government for the purpose of effecting changes in the Universities will be Conservative in its spirit—that it will aid the progress of University education without destroying the character and ruining the prestige of the Universities. I presume that any measure having reference to Primary Education will follow on the lines laid down in 1870. I am aware that School Boards are unpopular with some persons; but I believe that time and a further experience of the Act of 1870 will do much to remove acerbities now existing. With regard to the Inclosure of Commons, legislation is necessary; but I hope that no Bill will pass which will deprive the people of open spaces desirable for their health and recreation. My Lords, I will conclude by seconding the Motion for the Address. [See Page 12].

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords—Both my noble Friends—the noble Earl who moved and the noble Earl who seconded the Address—have made allusion to the indulgence which Peers in their position usually receive from your Lordships' House on occasions like the present. I venture to think that it has been a source of great satisfaction to this House, and very creditable to it, that for many years successive Governments have selected noble Lords not of advanced age or of great experience in debate who have been able, with very great distinction, to do what, in my opinion, are two of the most difficult things in the world—to move and second the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. With regard to the noble Earl who moved the Address on this occasion, I must say that I feel the satisfaction which I am sure all your Lordships feel at seeing him perform such a duty in a House in which his grandfather occupied such a distinguished position. This House will sincerely join in the satisfaction expressed both by the noble Earl who moved the Address and by my noble Relative who seconded it at the fact that Her Majesty has been able to appear on the Throne this day to open in person this Session of Parliament. The speeches of my noble Friends were highly creditable to them; but I remarked that in regard to some of the subjects mentioned in the Speech from the Throne both the noble Earls summed up their observations very briefly. Both noble Earls seemed anxious to avoid any allusion to the Bill for regulating the Ultimate Tribunal of Appeal. Well, there are some things over which it is better to throw a veil, and perhaps the noble Earls thought that this was one of them. Again, my Lords, it occurred to me as I heard the enumeration of those measures that there were some rather remarkable omissions from the Speech of to-day. Last year, to judge by the Speech from the Throne at the commencement of the Session, the Public Health was an object of greatest solicitude to Her Majesty's Government; but in the Speech from the Throne to-day there was no mention whatever of a question which had been in former years an object of such anxious solicitude. I hope I may infer that the public health is now in a satisfactory state, seeing that there is a most remarkable silence on the part of the Government in reference to their once favourite topic. Even the Pollution of Rivers Bill of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) finds no place in the Speech now before your Lordships' House. With regard to Education, I am glad the Government are applying themselves to that subject, and I shall await with anxiety the measures which they intend to introduce with reference to the Universities and to the Primary Education of the country—because I venture to think it will require all that skilful management in which my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council is so successful to enable him to reconcile the conflicting views of his Colleagues on the subject of Primary Education. The Home Secretary is said to be the friend of compulsory education; while, as I understand, the Prime Minister, in his private capacity, joined a majority to prevent the only means that was suggested of carrying out the Agricultural Education Act from being adopted in Buckinghamshire. I will reserve my judgment on the question until I see the Bill. I think the Bills which have been brought to our notice to-night are Bills of the greatest importance, and worthy of the greatest consideration on the part of your Lordships. I recollect hearing of a gentleman who said to an author that the pleasure he enjoyed in reading his books was equal to the pleasure he enjoyed in receiving them—which was not much; but I have no hesitation in saying that if the bill of fare presented to Parliament by Her Majesty's Government this Session be carried out in well-considered measures, and are steadfastly carried through Parliament, it will give satisfaction to Parliament and to the country at large. My Lords, there is one subject not referred to in the Speech from the Throne, but I cannot help alluding to it shortly, because it has occupied the attention of the public mind very much during the Recess. I mean the state of the Navy and the administration of the Admiralty. Serious charges—charges which would appear to be difficult to be answered—have been brought against the administration of the First Lord of the Admiralty. Now, those charges have undoubtedly received increased strength by the Fugitive Slave Circular. The accusation against the right hon. Gentleman based on that Circular is certainly undeserved: and I think it only right to point out that there are questions involved which are not merely of a departmental nature, and that, as the noble Earl opposite knows, the First Lord is not responsible for questions of that character. It is quite clear that my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs is responsible for that Circular, and that the First Lord of the Admiralty is not responsible for it. There are, however, other charges against the First Lord; but he has reserved his defence for his place in Parliament, and that being so, I think it is more becoming for me to await that defence before making any observation on those subjects. There are in your Lordships' House the Lord Privy Seal and other noble Lords who, no doubt, will be quite ready to defend him; but, as there will be a more fitting opportunity for entering on a discussion of these charges, I shall make no further allusion to them on this occasion. My Lords, there is a topic which, of necessity, has been brought prominently before your Lordships in Her Majesty's Speech; and here again I must give due credit for what I thought the appropriate manner in which the noble Earl, the Seconder of the Address, spoke of the triumphant and successful progress of the Prince of Wales in India, and the good results which are likely to follow from his journey through that Empire. It must certainly have been a great satisfaction to Government to be able to give in the Speech from the Throne a confirmation of the general impressions of the country of the affection and respect with which His Royal Highness has been received in India. In Her Majesty's Speech it was observed—

“At the time that the direct Government of my Indian Empire was transferred to the Crown, no formal addition was made to the style and titles of the Sovereign. I have deemed the present a fitting opportunity for supplying this omission, and a Bill upon the subject will be presented to you.”

I infer from that passage in the Speech that Her Majesty thinks it desirable to move in this matter, from considerations of the effect of such movement on the Native population, in connection with the visit of the Prince of Wales to that country. My Lords, I venture to say that, in regard of the dignity of Her Majesty herself, no name can appeal to the imagination so forcibly as that of Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland. My Lords, the noble Earls who moved and seconded the Address referred, in complimentary terms, to the administration of the Colonies. No doubt the administration of the Colonies has been viewed with favour by the country at large; but even on the Sun there are spots, and perhaps the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) will forgive me if I touch upon some of the spots of his administration. The Prime Minister, at the Mansion House some time ago, with that desire to render compliments to his Colleagues which so frequently characterizes his allusions to them, went a little beyond the ground on which he was standing, and spoke of the Confederation of the South African Colonies, remarking at the same time, that the Confederation of the North American Provinces was due to the Members of the present Government. I thought that the person who possessed sufficiently large and comprehensive views of Colonial policy to carry out a scheme of this kind was my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley), who now sits behind me. I am certain the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) will admit that the real work of the Confederation of North America was done in the time of my noble Friend, who afforded his sanction and encouragement to that measure, and during whose term of office that celebrated agreement was carried into effect in Canada, and also, I think, in Nova Scotia. The noble Earl, no doubt, deserves great credit for the manner in which he took up the questions that were left to his hands, and it must have been with great satisfaction that he applied himself to the introduction and passing through Parliament the Imperial Act that was to carry that Confederation into effect. Several questions were, however, left behind—questions not altogether easy of solution—the purchase of the Hudson's Bay Territory, the question of the Vancouver Territory, and also of Prince Edward's Island, which, under my noble Friend, joined that Confederation. I am afraid that there is at this moment the question of Newfoundland and its fisheries, which still remains open, and is not very easy of settlement. I said there were spots on the Sun, and with all the noble Earl's ability, industry, and patriotism, if he has a defect it is, perhaps, that he is so desirous to promote a policy that finds acceptance and which is desirable in itself, that he is a little too anxious to publish his opinions, and does not take quite sufficient care to mature his plans so as to bring them to the most favourable issue. When the noble Earl introduced a new policy for the administration of the affairs of the Natives of Natal it certainly did strike me that it was an imprudent thing to publish a despatch which was sure to be translated in the colony, and which described the position of the Chiefs and Natives. The noble Earl, after describing the enthusiastic devotion of the Natives towards their Chiefs, went on to state that it was desirable to diminish that attachment and to detach the Natives from the Chiefs. That was not, I think, a prudent declaration, when you consider the influence of the Chiefs and the inexhaustible number of Natives with whom you have to deal in Natal. In the same way the noble Earl undertook a measure which I believe to be of the greatest importance, and which I hope he will be able to carry through—for it is a measure which will do him great credit—I mean the Confederation to which Mr. Disraeli alluded. That is a proposal of the greatest importance and advantage; but the noble Earl directed the immediate publication of a despatch containing errors which he was afterwards obliged to retract—errors which might have been corrected by a little more communication with the Governor of the Colony and the local authorities.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I beg the noble Earl's pardon. I am not aware that I have retracted any errors.

EARL GRANVILLE: At any rate the noble Earl used language which, justly or unjustly, was sure to be irritating to certain persons belonging to the Colonial Government, and there can be no doubt that the noble Earl did afterwards withdraw the names of those particular persons. There is also another point connected with this Confederation, upon which the Government will be required to give explanations. I should desire to know what is the exact position of a very eminent man, of great intellectual powers—Mr. Froude—who was sent to that colony by the Colonial Office. We shall also require to know what are the conditions under which he has acted, and whether it is true that—after the noble Earl himself had laid down in the clearest manner the constitutional relations between the Home Government and the Colonial Government—the Delegate, or the Commissioner, or whatever post Mr. Froude occupied, absolutely “stumped” the colony at meetings of the most hostile character to the existing Government of the colony. I shall be curious to know whether that conduct has been approved or disapproved by the noble Earl. I do not see why because a colony having representative institutions is small, you should not be as punctilious in your relations with it as you would be with the largest of your colonies. I now approach the subject of Foreign Affairs. I have been now for some time in Parliament, and I cannot reproach myself with ever having intentionally said anything to embarrass a Secretary of State, whoever he might be, in his negotiations or relations with foreign Governments, and I feel that such a course is perfectly consistent with the freest discussion of Foreign Affairs in Parliament. I am bound to say that during the first 18 months of the present Administration it would have been very difficult for me or any of my friends to attack the Foreign Minister. There was no question of very great importance going on, and, as far as I know, no mistakes were made by the noble Earl. I am not sure there were not a few people in the country who regretted that the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) did not do anything a little foolish and a little sensational. But the case is different now. At the present moment—during the Recess—three questions have arisen which have in an extraordinary degree occupied the public mind. As to one the country has waited with prudent reticence to hear the statement which will be made by the Government in Parliament, and has abstained from prejudicing the question one way or the other. I refer to the complications which have been referred to by the Mover and Seconder of the Address as having arisen in consequence of the insurrection in Herzegovina, and also to the concluding act of the Government in joining in the Andrassy Note to the Government of Constantinople. If I remember right, in October last the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, when he spoke at Liverpool, treated the matter very lightly, and expressed his belief that we should hear little more about it. He also expressed his conviction as to the readiness of the Porte to do what was right in regard to the Christian subjects of the Sultan; and he pointed out with excellent judgment some of the difficulties that attended the question. A month later the Prime Minister, speaking at the Mansion House, was obliged to take a much graver view of the insurrection; and the noble Earl himself a month afterwards naturally took a graver view of the insurrection than he had done before. He said he might be thought a dupe, but he certainly thought that the other Powers were in earnest in co-operating for the peaceful settlement of the question. I am not one of those who think that the noble Earl was a dupe in entertaining that belief. I think he was right in that belief, which was based on the great interests which the different Powers have in the peaceful settlement of the question. If all those Powers had the same views or interests the matter might be serious; but any statesman, however bold, would hesitate to incur the responsibility of breaking up the Ottoman Empire, and dealing with the Mussulman and Christian populations of the Sultan. No doubt there must be differences of opinion and separate views and interests among the Great Powers, and I think that was a sufficient reason for the noble Earl's belief in a moderate settlement of the matters in question. The question for the public is threefold. Austria would naturally take the initiative in these representations to the Porte. I do not in the slightest degree object to that; but what the House will wish to know is whether we took any part in the negotiations that led the three Powers to frame the Note, or whether we were only consulted by the three Powers when the Note was settled. The next question, of the greatest importance, is, whether the Treaty does or does not infringe the provisions of the Treaty of 1856 as revised in 1871?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the noble Earl had spoken of the Note by mistake as a Treaty.

EARL GRANVILLE: What I want to know is whether the presentation of the Note affected in any way the Treaty of 1856 and the revised Treaty of 1871? Now, I apprehend that any effect of that kind would depend upon Article 7 and Article 9 of the Treaty of 1856—the first of those Articles securing the independence of the Ottoman Empire and the latter referring to the spontaneous promises of the Sultan to grant certain rights to his Christian subjects. It is very important to know whether the mode in which the Note was presented was calculated to infringe upon those Articles. Subject to that reservation, I venture to express the opinion that there has been no infringement in what we have learnt has been done, and neither Lord Palmerston nor Lord Clarendon ever considered that the Treaty precluded us from attempting, in common with other Powers, to obtain from the Porte the fulfilment of the promises which it admitted were embodied in that Treaty. If the Government have no statement to make on this point so much the better; and if they decline to speak on matters of so delicate a character, I am not the person to press them to do what may be inconvenient or disadvantageous. I now refer to another subject which has awakened very general interest in the public mind—the purchase of the Suez Canal shares. I must say that I think it very creditable to the impulses and instincts of the people of this country that they have received the announcement of the three matters of which I am speaking in the way they have done. That of the Suez Canal purchase was received with very general approbation, which I am not sure has not diminished to some extent. I think the history of the Canal is one of the most extraordinary illustrations it is possible to imagine of the French proverb—Man proposes and God disposes. We all remember how Lord Palmerston opposed the Canal. With regard to the engineering mistake, that could hardly be imputed to him, for he spoke on the engineering authority of this country; and, as regards his financial prophecies, I can only hope that they may be equally falsified, though it can hardly be said they have been up to the present moment. There can be no doubt that the reasons which influenced him were of the most purely patriotic character, and that he was entirely carried away by very much the same sort of considerations as I believe influenced Napoleon III. and the French in their great anxiety to promote the scheme. But one effect of Lord Palmerston's opposition, whatever other effects it may have had, was to excite a strong feeling in France. I do not know how far it diminished the investments of English capital in the Canal—but I generally find that British capitalists are extremely apt to look after their own affairs and to think they know better than official gentlemen. At all events, Lord Palmerston's opposition was the cause of M. Lesseps' getting funds in France. Mr. Senior, in his amusing Journal, tells us that there was no shopkeeper in Paris who did not buy a share to have his revenge on those English; and M. Lesseps tells of a gentleman who came to him for shares in a railway in the island of Sweden, to whom M. Lesseps replied—"It is not a railway, it is not an island, it is not Sweden; but it is a canal, it is an isthmus, and it is Suez." "Never mind," said this enthusiastic gentleman, "it is to spite the English, and it is all the same." The French people who thus laid down their money, and who have been out of it all this time, have certainly conferred great benefits on this country. The question of England acquiring some interest in the Canal was not entirely dormant during the administration of the late Government. M. Lesseps came to this country, and it was generally considered a grateful tribute to the ability with which he had carried out an enterprise so beneficial to this country when the Queen presented to him one of the highest of our Orders. Proposals were at that time made to our capitalists and suggestions were made by our Consul General in Egypt and by English gentlemen connected with the Suez Canal; but none of those proposals were in the slightest degree definite enough to call upon the Government to regard the matter, as they otherwise would have done, as one for very grave consideration. The Prime Minister authorized Mr. Lefevre, the Secretary to the Board of Trade, to see M. Lesseps and to obtain the data on which any proposal should be made. Mr. Lefevre and M. Lesseps met several times; and at the last interview M. Lesseps told Mr. Lefevre that though he had powers to enter into arrangements with the English Government, it must be a sine quâ non that the control and direction of the Canal must remain with himself and the French Council; and that I own made it unnecessary to go further into the matter. I think it would be a great mistake to go into any serious discussion of the purchase of the shares, as we have not the Papers before us; but I may be allowed to point out one or two matters which we may at once dispose of, and which need not impede the progress of the serious discussion when it comes on. Praise and blame have been bestowed on the Government, neither of which I think is of great importance. It has been said that things had not gone well with the Government in the last Session, and that they had got into some scrapes during the Recess, and that by this transaction they hoped to divert public attention from their misfortunes, and to turn it into other channels. Now, I wish to state that—whether this purchase strengthens or weakens our position in time of peace or in time of war—whether it is wise or unwise—I have not the slightest doubt Her Majesty's Government went into the matter with the single-minded view to the maintenance of our most important line of communication with India. Again, it has been said—and it was intended to be complimentary—that this was the beginning of a new, great, comprehensive, and spirited foreign policy; that the Government wished to obtain a protectorate over Egypt, and that they wished to depart from our traditional policy on the Eastern Question. But the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary repudiated, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, any intention of the sort. This was not only an honest and sensible thing to do, but it required some moral courage on his part entirely to throw away this oriel glory. But if the noble Earl would decline to accept the exalted position of Chatham, some of his friends thought it complimentary to represent him as the most accomplished disciple of Machiavelli, and to suggest that his real object was that which he disavowed: but if he really desired to obtain Egypt, the noble Earl would have been more skilful had he held his tongue until the proper moment had arrived. I must say the noble Earl held very proud and proper language at Edinburgh, when he said—"We have said what we want, and why we want it, and Europe is accustomed to believe what we say." It is a proud boast, and I believe he was entitled to use it. We are occasionally abused abroad—sometimes with justice, sometimes without; but I do believe our reputation for truthfulness stands very high indeed, and I cannot imagine anything more injurious to our influence for good than that either opponents or friends should suspect that Her Majesty's Government would hold, directly or indirectly, language which would have the effect of throwing doubts over the plainest assertion of the Foreign Secretary, and make it believed abroad that his character, his position, and his powers of clear expression were intended to be used only to conceal his thoughts. There is another point on which I wish to make a remark. At the outset, when the purchase was first announced, it was said it was a good commercial transaction, and I think the noble Earl assured us we should never lose a penny by it; since then various statements and counter-statements have been made by persons of authority. I am inclined to doubt whether good commercial transactions are ever conducted in a hurry, and I conceive some explanation is necessary when the transaction is the purchase of a long reversion at a price above the market value. I do not know whether it has ever happened to any of your Lordships to have dealings of that kind; but I have often heard that when in such a case a person proposed to take time to consider in order to ascertain something about the value of the security, the ready answer always was, "for God's sake don't; there is an old lady round the corner who is quite determined to have it, and I cannot disappoint the old lady, if you don't have it." But I believe it is generally found afterwards that the article is not quite so valuable as it was represented to be. But there is another thing which one can hardly conceive—namely, the lending of money at £5 per cent to one who borrows in the market at £9 per cent. My own inclination is to believe that, as a commercial speculation, the purchase of these shares was not a good one: but I shall be content to rely entirely on the statements which, I trust, the Government will be able to lay before Parliament. But even if they can prove that it is an excellent speculation that of itself will not justify them in what they have done; and, on the other hand, if its opponents prove that the speculation was unprofitable, I say that is by no means fatal to the wisdom of the act. The question really turns on this—whether the step was taken with reference to any well understood measure of policy—upon that it must float or sink. I will not argue the case one way or another. I should, however, like to know whether at the time of this purchase the Government were acquainted with the constitution of the Company and the amount of influence which the possession of these shares would command—whether the shares were purchased as a means of obtaining an effectual control over the management of the Canal—whether they knew that however large the number of shares they bought, they would have only a certain limited number of votes; and whether they knew that M. Lesseps had secured to himself the permanent management of the Canal for a certain number of years? I should also like to know, while the Canal has been in the possession of a French Company, what amount of practical inconvenience up to this time has been suffered by commerce, and whether in time of peace the Government without the possession of these shares would not have sufficient influence to prevent inconvenience to commerce? In case of disputes among the shareholders themselves, I want to know whether the course taken by the Government would in any way increase or diminish that influence? I should like also to know whether the possession of these shares in respect of which they can derive no pecuniary interest for 19 years can in time of war protect our road to India, further than our influence in having the immense share as customers of the Canal and more than the maritime supremacy of England? These are the points on which I want to hear what can be stated by the Government. There is one point connected with this, whether the purchase was right or wrong—whether Parliament should meet only this day instead of in December. My own opinion is that, considering that it involved a loan from Messrs. Rothschild of £4,000,000—a transaction of a new and unusual character—the Government was wrong in not calling Parliament together in December. It is unwise to create a new precedent in a doubtful matter. Lord Melbourne had a maxim which I think was a very sound one—that when the Government had anything doubtful to do the quicker they were in calling Parliament together to share the responsibility the better. I quite share that opinion; and therefore when I find that Her Majesty's Government did not call Parliament together, I cannot help thinking that the Government in this case have acted as if they had no information which would stand Parliamentary investigation; and that it was more convenient for them to wait two months in order to get that information. This brings me to another point on which I should like information—I mean the mission of Mr. Cave. I do not know that that mission has anything to do with these Canal shares; but I am curious to know in what capacity Mr. Cave has gone out, and for what purpose. I feel curious to know whether the Khedive applied, as he has done before, for the assistance of some Englishman of high character to advise him, or under what inducement Her Majesty's Government sent out, with very considerable ostentation, their Paymaster General, accompanied with officials of other Departments. I should like to know what instructions were given to Mr. Cave. Was he sent out solely to ascertain the value of these shares, or to go into the whole finances of the Khedive? Of one thing there can be no doubt—the moral effect of the interference of the Government with the finances of that country. The natural result is that people believe that the Government in some way or other have taken the management of the finances of Egypt, and that people have been “bearing” and “bulling” large sums, and all in consequence of this ostentatious commission, which was certainly of a very unusual character, and which will require a great deal of explanation to reconcile it to your Lordships. I come now to refer to another matter which aroused a spirit of, I may say, indignation throughout the country—I mean the famous Fugitive Slave Circular. The excitement which it caused was great, not only among Liberal Members but among Conservative Members. Even the Chancellor of the Exchequer, forgetting his official prudence, denounced it in a speech, which was reported in all the newspapers next day, in which he altogether repudiated the Circular, and said he did not know what it meant or who was responsible for it. Mr. Cave, the Paymaster General—a most loyal Colleague—said it was no doubt a blunder, but a blunder committed during the Recess and in the absence of the chief of the Department. Now, I believe Mr. Cave is a very good man of business, but I do trust he will be a little more accurate in getting up his facts about the finances of Egypt than he was about this Circular. The noble Earl the Minister for Foreign Affairs was the first who dealt with the Circular, and he put the case very briefly and with his usual judgment. He said it was issued on the advice of the highest legal authorities. These must be the Law Officers of the Crown, or perhaps the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack himself. Now, if there was any doubt as to the law, the position was no doubt a difficult one: and yet in the second Circular you unfortunately retained the principle of that policy which, rightly or wrongly, was condemned almost universally by the country. Now, at a later period, two Members of the Government based their defence of the Circular upon precedents said to have been afforded by the late Government. All I can say in reply to that is, that as far as I myself am concerned, it has never been my duty, as a Minister of the Crown, to criticize slave circulars. I will go further, and say that I do not think the subject of a slave circular was ever mooted in any Cabinet with which I had the honour to be connected. There was certainly a letter issued by Lord Clarendon on the subject, which to some extent might be regarded as in some degree favouring the tone of the policy embodied in the second Circular of the present Government; but upon close examination I think your Lordships will agree with me that that similarity is rather scant, and that it does not really justify the course which has been taken. So far as I can see it is perfectly impossible for the Government to maintain their second Circular any more than they were able to maintain the first. I do not mean that the noble Earl could not justify it by “the first legal opinions” received in the beginning, and subsequently by the more matured opinion that he got. The noble Earl may attempt to justify it also by the precedents of former Governments; but I believe there was no Government of late years which ever dreamed of ordering the surrender of slaves who had taken refuge on our ships out of territorial waters. When you consider that up to the present time there has been such progress all over the world in the abolition of the Slave Trade, when you consider the excitement produced in the public mind—not only the lay mind, but the legal—and the discussions which have been advanced, and when you consider that upon the whole subject the greatest alarm has been felt on all sides, I believe it would be perfectly impossible for Her Majesty's Government to adhere to that Circular. Therefore I was prepared and not surprised at their having beat a retreat; but I confess I was not equally prepared for the mode of the retreat. Now, what is it? They have had recourse to their old friend a Royal Commission. It is their resource in all difficulties. If a cloud no bigger than a man's hand appears on the horizon, immediately a Royal Commission is sought for. And what is this Royal Commission to inquire into? We are told in the Speech from the Throne that it is—

"To inquire into all Treaty engagements and other International obligations bearing upon this subject, and all instructions from time to time issued to my naval officers, with a view to ascertain whether any steps ought to be taken to secure for my ships and their Commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty."

Well, these instructions are of two kinds. First of all, the Royal Commission is to collect information which I stake my credit could be obtained in one afternoon from a clerk in the Slave Trade Department and from the head of that Department. But it is to collect information. Well and good; but do your Lordships think that when the Government issued their first Circular they had not all the information at their command which they can possibly have now? They talk of precedents; but must not these precedents have been in their mind when they first undertook to deal with the question? To talk, therefore, of collecting information on such a subject by means of a Royal Commission is nothing more than a delusion and a sham. What, in short, has the Commission to do? Why, it has a much more important task than that of collecting information—it has to frame a policy for Her Majesty's Government. Well, speaking for myself I must say that I do not think the people of England will consent to this. They are powerful in both Houses of Parliament; they are powerful in the country: but depend upon it the feeling of the country on this subject is not to be trifled with. Lord Castlereagh once made a speech on the Slave Trade, and when he sat down Mr. Wilberforce rose and said—

"I know the noble Lord, and I know he hates slavery; but if the noble Lord had been in favour of slavery, if he had been a promoter of the Slave Trade, I believe that this is exactly the speech which in that case he would have made."

Now, I know Her Majesty's Government. Nobody can have a doubt of their detestation of slavery; but I do feel strongly that in taking these means of evading the difficulty—in trying, as they are about to do, to throw the responsibility of their slavery legislation on the irresponsible shoulders of a Royal Commission—they are adopting a course which will induce the country to think that they are procrastinating on this question. This is no Party question. No Party has a right to arrogate to itself an exclusive interest in the abolition of slavery, or an exclusive interest in its detestation of slavery. It is a great national question; and I do trust that Her Majesty's Government will feel that by coming forward and taking upon themselves the responsibility of what is to be done, and not seeking to get quit of it by delegating it to a Royal Commission, they will be adopting the best and the surest course.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords—I am sure your Lordships will not expect, and it certainly has not been the custom on former occasions of a similar kind, that I, or that any Member of the Government should enter into a full and detailed discussion of any one of the various subjects which are treated in the Speech from the Throne. There would be two obvious objections to such a course in the present instance—one that the Papers which relate to the various transactions, and on which your information will necessarily be for the most part based, are not yet in your Lordships' hands; and the second objection is that, owing to the multiplicity of the subjects mentioned, it would be impossible to deal exhaustively with any one of them in a consecutive and a continuous discussion. Not long ago a very eminent Member of the House of Commons—who was a sportsman as well as a statesman—likened a debate on the Address to a day's coursing where there were too many hares on the ground—you started a fresh hare every moment and caught none. I therefore propose now to touch only on a few of the main questions which have been indicated in the Speech from the Throne, and which have been referred to by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville). But before doing so, I must join with him in the agreeable duty of expressing what I think is the general feeling of your Lordships as to the manner in which the Mover and Seconder of the Address have discharged their difficult and delicate duty. They have discharged their office with good taste and good judgment. I am sure, from the ability both have shown, that your Lordships will feel gratified if they should take a part in our discussions on future occasions. It is impossible, as I have said, to discuss the various questions of domestic legislation which have been referred to in the Speech from the Throne; but I will just say this—that if the list of measures to be brought before Parliament is not so large as it has been on some other occasions, we have been guided by important considerations. In the first place, we have been influenced by the wish not to undertake more than we have a reasonable prospect of being able to accomplish; and, in the next place, we have been taught by former experience that if more measures are brought forward during one Session than can be conveniently dealt with they are almost sure to be in one another's way—they fail to pass, and “Most haste is worst speed.” But if, as I have said, our list is not as long as it has been on some former occasions, the subjects dealt with are not inconsiderable. We propose to deal with the Ultimate Tribunal of Appellate Jurisdiction, with the laws relating to Merchant Shipping, with University Reform and Primary Education, with the question of Inclosures, and with the re-organization of our Prison System. These are not small results to aim at, and if we succeed in effecting them the Session will not have been wasted. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) referred to the subject of Appellate Jurisdiction, mentioning the fact that the Mover and Seconder had taken no notice of that subject; and he said that perhaps the reason was that it is one of those questions over which it might be convenient to throw a veil. If there is any “veil” in the case—of which I am not aware—I think my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack will not be long before he takes it off. The noble Earl also referred to the want of any sanitary measures in the programme submitted to Parliament. Now, we are deeply and warmly interested in sanitary reforms; but I am not aware that we ever promised to introduce a new Public Health Bill every year. Last year there was a Bill of 400 clauses; and I do not suppose that those who take the deepest interest in those questions would think it convenient or satisfactory that we should every year add to or alter the mass of existing legislation upon them. My Lords, I do not think I need dwell at any length upon the questions of Indian and Colonial policy which are referred to in the Royal Speech. The proposed addition to the style and titles of the Sovereign will mark more clearly the relation which She holds to the Native Princes of India, but it raises no controverted question—it makes no change in the relations between governors and governed—it involves no doubtful point of constitutional law—and it is not, therefore, a proposal likely to lead to difference of opinion. The disorders in the Malay Peninsula, which at one moment undoubtedly bore a threatening aspect, have been put an end to by prompt action on the spot; and I think I may say that throughout the vast area of territory under the administration of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies there is no disorder; I believe I may add, there is no discontent. When the time comes, my noble Friend will be able to explain to your Lordships the progress made in the important scheme of Confederation of the South African Colonies; and I may say that my noble Friend will also take an early opportunity of eliciting the opinion of Parliament upon a subject which, in its present state, it was not thought desirable to mention in the Speech from the Throne—I mean the negotiations on which we last year entered for an exchange of territory with France upon the West Coast of Africa. That is a subject which has been much discussed in the public Press, and I may therefore remind your Lordships that it was stated on the part of the Government last year that no steps would be taken in regard to it without giving to the country and to Parliament the fullest opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the measure. To that pledge we adhere, and I only mention it now to show that it has not been forgotten. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) spoke in very complimentary and well-deserved terms of the Colonial administration of my noble Friend. But the unintentional compliment paid by the noble Earl was even higher than that which he expressed, because he was obliged to go back to two matters which I should think hardly any one in this country would have thought of as subjects of criticism—one the publication of a despatch relating to the affairs of Natal; the other, the appointment of a certain person to act in an official capacity in South Africa. Almost the highest compliment which could be paid to the head of any Department is that his critic should dwell upon matters so small in themselves, because it furnishes the most conclusive proof that causes of complaint have been looked for, and that none of any importance could be found. I turn now to a class of questions as to which I neither expect nor desire unanimity—questions with which I am departmentally connected, and relating to our foreign policy. I will take one by one the most important points that arise. The noble Earl did not, I think, refer to the affairs of China. In truth I have but little to add to the statement contained in the Speech from the Throne. Your Lordships are aware of what occurred in the course of last summer—the attack upon the Yunan Mission and the lamentable murder of Mr. Margary. We have insisted that that matter shall be thoroughly and strictly investigated, and we have required the presence of English officials to assist in the investigation as a security that it shall be real and not collusive. So much we have secured after protracted negotiations, in which Sir Thomas Wade has displayed his accustomed energy and ability. The inquiry is now in progress. The result remains to be seen. I need hardly say that we have the most anxious desire to remain on friendly terms with the Government of China. We can have no inducement and no desire to engage in a costly war carried on in a distant and unhealthy country, and in which no great honour can be gained. We can have no desire to injure our growing commerce in that quarter of the world. We can have no desire to help to break up the vast Empire of China or to have another "sick man" on our hands. We have every motive to induce us to insist upon nothing beyond what is strictly reasonable. But what we have demanded from China we cannot go back from; and I sincerely hope that the Chinese authorities will be well advised in this matter, and will not attempt, by any evasion or any delay, to shield those whose guilt may be proved, whatever may be the rank or official position of those persons. From that remoter scene I pass to another country, nearer to our own, with the affairs of which, during the last 20 years, we have been continually connected—I mean the Empire of Turkey. I need not allude to what you all know—the state of things which has prevailed during the last six months in a part of the Turkish Empire. The insurrection which broke out in Bosnia and Herzegovina was from a military point of view insignificant, and I do not know that even now it deserves any other name. It might have been speedily suppressed by an efficient and energetic Government. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) is right in supposing that when I referred to the subject last October I did so in the belief that the contest was not likely to assume serious proportions; and I think that belief was justified by the state of things then existing. But, as a matter of fact, efficiency and energy were not shown by those concerned in dealing with the insurrection; and when at last some action was taken, it coincided in point of time with that financial collapse which though important enough in other ways, and a cause of suffering to many of our countrymen, is most important and most significant as a sign of general maladministration. Naturally, by this act of repudiation the friends of Turkey were discouraged, and the insurgents gained hope and strength. They have not even now, as far as I can see, obtained any great success, but they have certainly not been put down; and apprehensions are entertained—probably not without reasonable cause—that, if the contest be not promptly suppressed, its area will be extended; Servia and Montenegro may be drawn into it, and there may be produced in those countries a general state of disturbance and confusion which will re-open the whole Eastern Question. That is not a prospect to which any one can look forward with satisfaction. A war of that kind, however it may begin, would infallibly as it went on become a religious war—a war between Mussulman and Christian; and even in districts where there might be no actual conflict, feelings of mutual animosity and antagonism would be created between the two religions which, let me say in passing, would probably not be confined to Europe, but might be a source of trouble, and even of danger, to us in another part of the world. Under those circumstances it is not surprising that the Governments of Austria, Russia, and Germany should have been anxious to find a means of pacification. Your Lordships know from the Press the general purport of what has passed. The Note of Count Andrassy, which has now become public property, embodies the proposals which were agreed upon between the three Governments of Austria, Russia, and Germany. The noble Earl asks me whether we were consulted in framing the Note. My Lords, I have no hesitation in answering the question. The Note was framed, in the first instance, between the three Governments of Austria, Russia, and Germany. The three other States which have been concerned in the matter—namely, France, England, and Italy—were appealed to subsequently as to the course they would take. We agreed, as your Lordships are aware, to give a general support to the plan indicated in the Note. That decision was undoubtedly one of considerable importance, and I am bound to state clearly the reasons which led us to it. In this instance not only were the three traditional courses open to us, but there were four possible alternatives which we might have adopted. We might have retired from the whole matter, saying that it was no concern of ours. That would have been a very simple and a very easy course; but, my Lords, I do not think it would have been consistent with English policy or satisfactory to the country. It would have deprived us of all influence or right to make our voice heard in regard to future complications which might arise in the Turkish Empire. I ought, perhaps, to mention that not only were we solicited to take the step which we did take by every one of the other European Powers, but from communications we received we have good reason to believe that the Government of the Porte itself was most anxious that we should not stand aloof. Well, we might, in the second instance, have advised the Porte in a contrary sense to the advice embodied in the Austrian proposition. But either our advice would have been taken, or it would have been refused. If it had been rejected, we should have been placed in a false, and even ridiculous position, as being more zealous for Turkish independence than the Turks themselves; while, if such advice had been tendered by us and accepted by the Porte, we undoubtedly should have been mainly responsible for any calamity which might have befallen the Porte in consequence of acting upon our advice; and having made ourselves so responsible, it would have been difficult for us honourably to withdraw from the business, and to say—"It is no affair of ours." Again, we might, as a third alternative, have proposed some different course if we had had one to propose. It has been suggested, for instance, that the matters in dispute might have been referred to a Conference. But the objections to any proceeding of that kind are obvious. In the first place, we should have stood alone in making that proposition. Then, it would have been of no use to go into a Conference unless we had some definite proposal to bring before it:—so that the mode of proceeding suggested would only have ended in the consideration of some such scheme as has now been placed before the Porte, while there would, of course, have been a great loss of time which might have altogether prevented the work of pacification that we desire to promote. It seemed to us, therefore, that we had practically very little option as to the course we should adopt, both in the interest of the Porte and in that of the populations concerned. Then the question may be asked—"Do you believe that, assuming the Porte to act on the advice given, the insurgents will accept the conditions and will lay down their arms?" Well, that is a point on which no one can speak with certainty. Still, it should be borne in mind that by far the greater part of the strength of the insurrection appears to have been derived from districts lying beyond the Turkish frontier. Everybody knows how strong and general is the sympathy of the neighbouring populations; and I believe if the Austrian Government fulfils in an efficient manner, as it has undertaken to do, the duty which international obligations impose upon it—the duty, I mean, of properly watching its frontier—that the area of hostilities will be greatly limited. In that case, even if a total pacification does not occur, the whole affair will be reduced to the dimensions of a local disturbance, and will cease to be of European importance. If, however, the war should continue as before, it will be for Her Majesty's Government and the other Governments of Europe to consider what steps to take—and I do not think the noble Earl opposite would expect me to state now what course we should take in the event of certain contingencies which it is impossible at present to foresee. I may, however, say now that as regards all future proceedings, we hold ourselves entirely free. We have given a general support to this Austrian proposition because we believe that, on the whole, its acceptance is the wisest course for the Porte to adopt; but it is quite within our power—I do not say to withdraw, for there is no withdrawal in the question—but to abstain from further action, without anyone being able to say that we have either disappointed expectations which we have created or broken any engagements into which we have entered. I am aware that the course we have adopted may be attacked from two opposite points of view. Some persons may think that any interference in the internal affairs of Turkey is indefensible on principle, and is a breach of Treaty engagements. Now, my Lords, to that my answer is two-fold. In the first place I say, Volenti non fit injuria. Our adhesion to the Austrian proposal was regarded by the Porte as a benefit. In the next place, I do not think that Treaty obligations apply to such a case as the present. You do not, as a rule, enter your neighbour's house without his leave; but if his house is on fire, if he cannot or will not put it out, and if the fire is likely to spread, you are not likely to be scrupulous about committing a trespass. On the other hand, there are many persons whose opinion is deserving of all respect who think that nothing ought to be done to avert or postpone the general breaking up of the Turkish Empire. That, my Lords, is not a matter within our power. We may abstain from interfering; but it does not follow that other Powers will do so. There are other Governments besides Turkey which, in their own interests, are not inclined to allow of a wide-spread agitation among the Slavonic races, having for its object the creation of a powerful Slave State. For my part, I repeat that a war between the Mahomedan and the Christian populations of Turkey would be a great evil to the world and possibly a danger to ourselves; and I hold that if, without too deeply compromising ourselves, we can stave off that event, we should have done a good work for ourselves, for Turkey, and for civilization. I do not think the noble Earl (Earl Granville) expects an immediate reply to the rather large questions which he put to me on this subject. One was, whether the Note affected in any way the provisions of the Treaty of Paris. I do not know what particular stipulation of the Treaty the noble Earl had in mind; but I believe there is in the Note no contravention of that Treaty. I have now, I think, said enough on the question of the Austrian Note, and by a natural transition I pass on to Egypt. The question of the Suez Canal will, no doubt, come before your Lordships and the other House of Parliament at a very early period: you will not, therefore, expect that I should at the present moment enter into it in detail, and I shall confine myself to saying a few words on the point of principle. It appears to me that ever since the Suez Canal was constructed it has been felt that it was a misfortune to England that the undertaking should have been entirely executed by a foreign Company. It is of no use discussing now the manner in which that state of things came about. I do not wish to be unjust to Lord Palmerston, or to accuse him of having taken a mistaken view of the situation—there were many circumstances connected with the scheme of the Canal, as it was originally brought out, which may naturally have exercised a powerful influence over the mind of a Minister in his position:—but the fact remains that the Canal was made by the aid of foreign capital, it was made in spite of the opposition of the English Government, and its management remained in French hands. There was, however, a double check on the administration of the company—one the authority of the Sultan, and the other the influence possessed over the Canal by the Viceroy of Egypt, partly in his territorial capacity of Ruler of the country through which it passed, and partly, also, as being the person most largely interested, as a shareholder, in its success. Now, it is evident that, under existing circumstances, the power of the Sultan over M. Lesseps and his Company must have been in some degree diminished; and when the Viceroy was anxious to sell his shares, and when a French Company was ready to buy them, it was clear that if they had done so their power over the Canal would have become more absolute and complete than at any former time. We did not think that would be a desirable result, considering that the Canal is our high road to India, and that more than three-fourths—I believe it would be more accurate to say four-fifths, of the tonnage passing through it belongs to us. I cannot believe that our desire to have, under the circumstances, an increased control over the Canal was unreasonable. We saw our way to acquire the influence necessary for that purpose, and we seized the opportunity. I do not in the least care to deny that the transaction is one of an unusual character. It is, I dare say, a somewhat out-of-the-way thing for the Government of a great State to become shareholders in a commercial undertaking; but it is an equally peculiar thing that a foreign and private Company should hold possession of that which has become, not indeed the only, but the principal means of communication between England and a dependency which is in itself an Empire. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) has referred to various reports in connection with this subject, and he has expressed it to be his opinion that the transaction ought not to have been concluded without calling Parliament together at the earliest possible moment. Now, I need not point out—what the noble Earl himself admits, and what, indeed, is obvious—that although the Government may have bound themselves, they have not bound and could not bind Parliament in the matter. We took upon ourselves the risk and the responsibility of recommending to Parliament the purchase of those shares. Legally and constitutionally we could do nothing more than this; Parliament was free to reject the bargain; and I think we are entitled to contend that, in postponing the meeting of Parliament till the usual time, we were not influenced by any undue motive. We acted in that respect against our own interests. There is no doubt that if Parliament had been summoned on the earliest possible day to become a party to the purchase, there would have been much less discussion than will probably be the case now, and the transaction would have been completed under an impulse of general enthusiasm. I do not, however, think that would have been desirable on public grounds. I look upon the question as a grave matter, and one which ought to be discussed in a deliberate manner. If, then, any one complains of delay because a period of two months has been allowed to elapse before Parliament was summoned, in my opinion there would have been quite as good reason, had Parliament been summoned at once, for complaining that we were taking the country by surprise, and not affording the opportunity for having the subject fully and calmly discussed. I need add nothing as to the consideration—though it is one not wholly without importance—that much public inconvenience is caused by the assembling of Parliament before the usual time, and that when it does assemble under such circumstances it is very often deprived of the assistance of some of its most useful Members who, being in distant parts of the world, are not able to arrive in time for its meeting. That, I believe, is all I have to say on this part of the subject; but I may, perhaps, be allowed shortly to refer to the view the noble Earl takes as to the commercial aspect of the transaction, which I agree with him in thinking is certainly not its most important feature. I have good hopes that in a financial point of view the bargain will not turn out to be a bad one. I have expressed that opinion before, and I repeat it; but I do not hesitate to say that if financially it turned out to be a bad bargain, that would be a consideration not to be set against its other advantages; and, on the other hand, that we should not have been justified in concluding the purchase merely on the ground that it would pay well. It is no part of our business to invest the public money in a foreign commercial undertaking because it gives a good return, and if we had acted on any ground of that kind we should be justly liable to criticism. What we desired was influence over the administration of the Canal. I have been told that we have not obtained it, because the voting power connected with the shares which we have bought is limited. Certainly I cannot prove the contrary. If a man denies that two and two make four, I know of no argument that will convince him; and anyone who contends that you may hold two-fifths of the capital of an undertaking like the Suez Canal and yet exercise no influence over it, seems to me to stand in the same position. Holding that large sum, we might if we pleased create a constituency which would not be far from a majority of the whole body of voters, and that is a power which, although we may not choose to exercise it, yet is not unimportant to hold in reserve. I am supposed to have said somewhere—I believe in Edinburgh—that I did not think any political significance was to be attached to this transaction. Now, my Lords, I never made any assertion half so foolish. I never said that the transaction was one of no political significance. What I did say, and what I now repeat, in answer to the observations of the noble Earl, is that it seems to me eminently desirable to repudiate that particular political significance which by many persons—not so much in England as abroad—has been attached to it. It was thought that the purchase was made for the purpose of establishing an exclusive Protectorate over Egypt, and that we had adopted the very policy which we opposed at the time of the Crimean War—that of a partition of the Turkish Empire. I hold that to ascribe to us a policy of that kind is an imputation on this country, and one which it is desirable to repudiate in a most distinct way. What we want is an uninterrupted passage through Egypt and the absence of any foreign control over that country. We want no exclusive use—no monopoly—of the Canal. What we desire is that no such exclusive monopoly should be established by others. We have a greater interest in the East than any other Power; but while we desire to maintain a free passage to the East, we are aware that others have the same wish, and we are bound to respect their interests, as we expect our own to be respected. During the last two or three years a good many difficulties have arisen with regard to the Suez Canal. They were not of a very grave character, and they have been adjusted in a more or less satisfactory manner; but they were and are constantly recurring, and it is their recurrence which we desire to prevent. M. de Lesseps has met us in a friendly spirit, and we are engaged in negotiations with him which I hope will result in a settlement of the various differences which have arisen between the Company and those who use the Canal, and also in the introduction of an English element into the management. I do not speak of that as a result which we are certain of obtaining, but we have reason to be hopeful. The state of the case is briefly this—on the one hand, we do not claim credit for a deep-laid and long-meditated act of policy. There has been nothing underhand—nothing done in secret; we used an opportunity which presented itself, and that was all. On the other hand, after the first moment of natural surprise, I do not believe there exists, or has existed, in any country in the world the slightest feeling of irritation or of distrust as to our policy on this subject. The noble Earl has referred to the financial mission of Mr. Cave. The history of that mission is simple. Every one knows that the Ruler of Egypt has been extremely active in promoting useful public works intended for the development of the resources of Egypt. These works are undertakings which involve a large expenditure of capital, and which are not immediately productive. The result is a certain amount of financial embarrassment. Her Majesty's Government in November last were applied to for the services of two English gentlemen, experienced in financial matters, to assist the Khedive in remedying the confusion which he stated to exist in many branches of his financial administration. We were willing to comply with that request; but it did not appear altogether clear in what capacity these gentlemen were to be sent out, and what was the nature of the services they were expected to perform. We therefore thought it better, before sending them out, to send some one well acquainted with finance and administration generally, and possessing the confidence of the Government, to ascertain more exactly than could be done by correspondence what it was that the Khedive wanted. We thought it desirable, also, that the gentleman whom we sent should be one who might offer him advice and be able to report to us what the financial situation of Egypt really was. The Khedive readily accepted that offer on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and gave Mr. Cave a friendly and even cordial reception. The noble Earl has referred to speculative transactions as having occurred in consequence of this mission. All I can say is, that if a Government is to abstain from doing any act which might lead people to speculate on the Stock Exchange, I really do not know what act of any State might not be liable to a similar objection. No doubt, there may have been a good deal of speculation in consequence of Mr. Cave's visit. If a Government goes to war with another, the effect of that proceeding is to raise the price of horses in the country concerned; but no one would accuse the Government in question of going to war in order to encourage speculation in horses, or hold them responsible for losses that might ensue. In the same way, if speculation should arise in consequence of this mission, we may regret it, but we do not admit that the fault is ours. We have instructed Mr. Cave to abstain most carefully from even appearing to mix himself up with any of those financial schemes which are frequently being laid before the Khedive, and we have no reason to suppose that he has departed from our instructions. We disclaim all desire to interfere in the internal affairs of the Khedive; but we have an interest in his prosperity, and we have shown it, among other things, in inducing him, without pressure or menace, but by mere friendly advice, to withdraw from what we believe to be an unintentional and inadvertent aggression on the territory of Zanzibar. I call it "inadvertent" because it does not appear to have been in the first instance sanctioned by the Government of the Khedive, but was an act done by the officer in command on his own responsibility. We have also obtained from the Khedive an assurance that he will not entertain any such projects as have been attributed to him of effecting the conquest of Abyssinia. We have reason to think that an honourable peace will before long be concluded with that country, and that the Egyptian troops will be withdrawn. My Lords, I have done with Egypt, and I now turn to a subject which I fully admit to the noble Earl has excited a feeling in this country disproportionate to any practical results which are likely to arise out of it. I mean the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into our national duties and obligations in regard to slaves who may escape on board our vessels in the waters of countries where Slavery is the law of the land. My Lords, I do not often agree with Mr. Bright, but I do agree with what he said in a recent speech, when he observed that this subject was not so free from difficulty as might appear at first sight. I think that any person acquainted with what has passed will admit that considerable uncertainty, confusion, and contradiction exist as to what our obligations really are. I have seen the Circular that was first put forward and subsequently withdrawn spoken of as if it had been a volunteered expression of opinion on the part of the Government. I do not know what your Lordships' experience may be, but my experience is that Government Departments are not fond of volunteering expressions of opinion on abstract propositions, and particularly in regard to doubtful questions, and where a good deal of unpopularity may be incurred. The fact is, that certain cases occurred which required that instructions should be issued. The Government were asked for those instructions, and we were bound to supply them. It has been said that we might have left the officers to act on their own responsibility; but subject to the condition that we were free to disavow their proceedings if we did not agree with them. That is a course which might be convenient to the Government, but it would be an evasion of responsibility, and unfair to the officers concerned. The question was referred to the Foreign Office, and, as is usual in such cases, we placed it in the hands of the Law Officers of the Crown. That Circular about which so much discussion has arisen was, as I stated at Liverpool, prepared by the highest legal authority. It was framed upon an opinion given by Sir John Karslake, Sir Richard Bagge, the late Attorney General, and by the present Attorney General, Sir John Holker. We all know what sort of client a layman is proverbially said to have when he becomes his own lawyer, and for my part, and on behalf of my lay Colleagues, I am not ashamed to admit that we did not consider ourselves better qualified to decide a point of law than the Law Officers of the Crown. I agree with the noble Earl that no Party considerations are involved in this question. There is no Pro-Slavery or Anti-Slavery Party in this country—the whole Slavery contest has been dead and buried for 40 years. But, then, the question may be asked, why, having issued that Circular, we withdrew it? We suspended the first Circular for two reasons: partly from a feeling of which I shall never be ashamed—that it is exceedingly undesirable to go against the general feeling of the country unless you are absolutely obliged to do so, and especially at a time when, Parliament not being in Session, detailed discussion and explanation are impossible. We had another reason which is equally intelligible. We suspended the first Circular and subsequently withdrew it, because an even higher legal authority—if it is not invidious to say so—I mean my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack—led us to believe that in that matter we had probably been wrongly, or, at any rate, doubtfully, advised. That was our position. My noble and learned Friend entertained grave doubts of the soundness of the law laid down by the Law Officers of the Crown; and in that conflict of opinion we were not prepared to commit ourselves to the defence of what might prove to be an untenable position. As to the Circular last issued, we are prepared to contend, and we think we can prove, that it accurately represents the state of the law. We have no wish, unnecessarily, to set ourselves against a strong and almost universal expression of public feeling; and if the public opinion of this country considers that existing international rules, such as we find them, ought to undergo modification, that is a result which it may not be impossible to accomplish, either by agreement with other Powers or in some other manner. But the first point is to know exactly how we stand, and there is no better way of ascertaining that than to obtain from a body of men who will command general respect an authoritative and impartial declaration of what our obligations and rights in the matter are supposed to be. The noble Earl opposite rather laughed at the notion of a Commission of Inquiry into such a matter; but I think I recollect that a Commission of Inquiry sat upon the subject of the Neutrality Laws—which was quite as much a matter of policy as this—and no one ever disputed that great advantage was derived from it in subsequent discussions. So, again, years ago, when I sat in the other House, various questions connected with Treaties of Extradition, upon which there was considerable doubt, came before us; they were referred to a Select Committee, and the result was the framing of the system under which our present Extradition Treaties have been negotiated. To whatever extent we may legislate or negotiate, it is desirable, in the first instance, that we should ascertain, in an authoritative manner, what our rights and obligations really are. This is the object of the step we have taken. I do not suppose the inquiry will occupy any length of time, and when the result is known we shall be prepared to act upon it. I have detained your Lordships an unreasonable length, but after the appeal made to me by the noble Earl, and considering the various subjects of interest on which information is expected by the public, I could adopt no other course.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, there are two or three observations I wish to make. And first with regard to the Suez Canal—and in regard to that I think my noble Friend has scarcely done justice to Lord Palmerston—I had frequent opportunities of conversing with Lord Palmerston upon the subject, and therefore I am able to state fairly what his opinions were. The noble Lord objected to the Canal on these grounds—He said we have now an open course to India for our commercial fleets and soldiers, and if new communications are to be opened there will be competition—for either Russia or France may seriously compromise our communication with India. You may remember that at that time there was a Napoleonic idea respecting Egypt, to the effect that it might become a French appanage, which had considerable influence on Lord Palmerston's mind. He knew the hereditary appetite for Egypt in the mind of the Emperor, and therefore he saw that great difficulties might arise. If the Canal did not succeed, Suez would still be a French town, and that would be a serious inconvenience to our existing communication; and if, on the other hand, it did succeed, it would be in the hands of a French party, supported by the French Government. If we look back to the time preceding the Emperor's attempt to march to Berlin, matters will wear a different aspect from that they present now; for had it succeeded, the Emperor might have gratified his hereditary appetite for Egypt. On that account Lord Palmerston objected to the occupation of Egypt by the French, which he foresaw would be the consequence of the making of this Canal. He said it might not be in our time that complexities would arise, but arise they must from the making of that communication; and we know that a year ago complications did arise about tonnage dues, and the Company wanted to stop the communication altogether. The Company objected to the exemption claimed for the parts of a ship occupied by machinery, or provided for the accommodation of sailors, and there was a discussion at Constantinople. This was just one of those difficulties which justified Lord Palmerston in objecting to the Canal. He saw its advantages, no doubt, but he thought it probable the disadvantages would be greater; and I am not so sure we are yet altogether clear of the difficulties the possibility of which he foresaw. I do not agree that it would have been well to have called Parliament together in December last. If Parliament had met in December, the purchase would have been approved with acclamation, and Parliament would have passed at once any measure that the Government might have proposed. But the feeling of the country has changed a little since then, and Parliament will now calmly consider this important matter. As to the proposed Commission on the Slavery question, I would ask whether it is wise to appoint such a Commission at all? You cannot lay down any hard-and-fast rules applicable to every case; and you must trust to the discretion of individual officers, in the cases that arise, for the exercise of their judgment. Legislation in a sense unfavourable to the slave will not be tolerated by this country, and a measure which may be popular here may embarrass us if rigidly applied in different parts of the world; and we shall be obliged at last to trust to the discretion of our officers, whom I have found on the whole to act with very great judgment in these cases. Many of them are as it were brought up to the practice of dealing with these cases of slavery, they are constantly discussing them, and they have a greater knowledge of the points involved than can be possessed by us in England;

because the actual cases with all the circumstances do not come before us. In dealing with the subject of Merchant Shipping, I hope the Government will not fall into the error of attempting to put everything into one Bill, but will separate the construction and loading of ships, the treatment of the men, and the subject of insurance; because by dealing with different branches of the matter separately, they will facilitate the passing of their Bills, and they will greatly facilitate the future amendment and consolidation of the law—for such future amendment will be inevitable—and if Acts are comparatively short they can be repealed and re-enacted with Amendments, which is a far better and less puzzling course than to pass amending Bills which contain only ambiguous references to former and inaccessible Acts.

Address agreed to, nemine dissente, and ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER reported, That this House has, this day, attended Her Majesty in the House of Peers, when Her Majesty was pleased to make, by Her Chancellor, a most gracious Speech from the Throne to both Houses of Parliament; of which, Mr. Speaker said, he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a Copy:—

And Mr. SPEAKER read it to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

MR. RIDLEY rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, in answer to Her Majesty's

Most Gracious Speech from the Throne; and said—Sir: It was with the most lively feeling of satisfaction that we received some time ago the announcement that it was the intention of Her Majesty to open Her Parliament this year in person; and I rejoice that it is my privilege this day to congratulate this House and the country upon the happy circumstance that no untoward event, no anxiety for friend or family, no ill health of her own, has stood in the way of the fulfilment of a purpose so agreeable alike to Her Majesty and to the nation.

Nor is it, Sir, of less fortunate omen that Her Majesty is able to announce to Parliament the brilliant progress which her son, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, is now making through that vast Empire, which will shortly, as we are led to day to hope, bring under such happy auspices a new title to Her Crown. There have been, Sir, anxieties—I ought, perhaps, to say, grave anxieties—attending the journey; there have been heavy responsibilities thrown upon those who have had the charge of a progress which has scarcely a parallel in history—certainly not in the annals of the British Crown. But we are assured, Sir, to-day, that those anxieties and fears have so far proved groundless; we know that the ordering of that journey has been marked by the most signal foresight and success. The people of this country, Sir, are following with the keenest attention the incidents of His Royal Highness's triumphal visit, which are so dramatically brought before them day by day: they are realizing with a vivid distinctness, which cannot but have the happiest results, something of the vast and varied interests which attach to the history, the religion, the civilization of those older races who are with them the subjects of Her Majesty, and who are receiving Her son with so loyal and enthusiastic a welcome. They appreciate to the fullest extent the energy and self-devotion for the public good of which His Royal Highness is giving so conspicuous an illustration. They can understand—for have they not experience of it themselves?—how his uniform kindness and courtesy is winning the hearts alike of Princes and people, and is likely to leave behind it an enduring influence for good upon the relations between us and those vast millions whom it is our lot to govern. It is, Sir, I make bold to say, the hope and the expectation of this House that when His Royal Highness shall have happily returned among us, he will be found not only to have enlarged his personal experience and knowledge of those deeply interesting subjects of the Throne to which he will at some period—we hope along distant period—succeed, but to have achieved a great and valuable work in aiding to consolidate and harmonize that magnificent inheritance.

It happens, Sir, in accordance with the line of thought evoked by this important circumstance in our history, that Her Majesty's Speech this year is emphatically that of the Sovereign of a great people, who with their large possessions have responsibilities equally great of which they cannot divest themselves. It is satisfactory to hear that our relations with all Foreign Powers are cordial, and to know that we are everywhere at peace. But the House this day is brought face to face with a vast group of questions relating to the East, of which that commonly known as the Eastern Question is but one in the series, and the extreme importance of which to our Imperial interests it is perhaps impossible to over-estimate.

Sir, in the far East, it is a matter for congratulation that a serious struggle has been again avoided with that huge Empire of China, the maintenance of friendly relations with which is of such importance, as well directly to the commercial interests of this country as indirectly to the finance and revenue of India. Happily, the reasonable and firm demands of our Minister at Peking were, though only at the last moment, acceded to, and Her Majesty is able to assure us that an investigation, in which She herself is represented, is being officially conducted into the outrage committed upon the English expedition sent from Burmah to the Western Provinces of China, and that She awaits with confidence a successful result of the inquiry.

The Malayan Peninsula has been the scene of an outbreak which has cost us more than one valuable life; but the war—if war it can be called—has been brought to a conclusion with signal skill and courage. I fear, however, it cannot be said that our difficulties have altogether been disposed of. They are difficulties of a kind which invariably threaten great Powers who, from outlying settlements, and with small available resources, have to control, without governing, the barbarous tribes of some region just beyond their frontier. From the nature of the case it is impossible always to provide beforehand for every contingency which may arise from such undefinable relations, and it too often happens that we have to deplore the loss of some fearless servant of the Crown, who is performing his mission alone and with his life in his hand, in the name of a nation great indeed and powerful, but powerful only in his case to avenge the outrage of which he has been the victim.

Sir, it is to a problem somewhat similar in character that the recent difference of opinion between the Cape Government and the Colonial Office may, perhaps, be traced. It seemed very desirable that all the English and Dutch communities of the South Coast of Africa should agree in some common policy towards the Natives of the interior, and should provide for some common defence in case a Native war should unhappily arise. Lord Carnarvon accordingly suggested a Conference of delegates from the various Colonies, and proposed also that they should consider the expediency of forming a Federation. The proposal, however, was not received with universal approval at the Cape, and it was in consequence suspended. Whether it be ultimately adopted or not, it is strongly to be hoped that the Papers which have been promised by the Government will show that the good feeling between the Colonies and the Mother Country has in no degree been impaired; and that if there has been any misunderstanding as to the intention of the proposal, that misunderstanding has been removed.

Some few years ago, Sir, a private Company, originated and promoted by one courageous and determined man, whose name will ever be associated with it, commenced a bold project, which was to open through Egypt a new highway between the Eastern world and the nations of the West. They were not supported by English capital—they were even opposed by English Ministers. But their project proved a success, and England discovered that a thoroughfare had been created which it was absolutely indispensable to her political, no less than her commercial, connection with the East should be open to the passage of her ships. From the first the international character of the Canal has been acknowledged both by the Ruler of Egypt and the Porte; but the controversy on the tonnage dues showed the difficulties which might arise between us, as the principal customers of the Canal, and the shareholders, no less than the inconveniences and even quarrels which might follow from the zeal of a foreign Government in promoting the objects of the Company. Under these circumstances it can be no matter for surprise that the country received with almost unanimous approval the announcement that Her Majesty's Government intended to propose to Parliament to sanction the purchase of those shares in the Company which were held by the Khedive. It was understood that an opportunity had offered itself for us to give timely aid to one of the original owners—who held these shares in "trust," as it had been declared, "for European nations"—and to become at the same time one of those who were interested in the Canal by property as well as by policy. It was thought that this opportunity had been rapidly and promptly seized, and that the legitimate influence of England in a highway of such vital importance to her had been secured, or at least strengthened, in a manner least likely to wound the susceptibilities of its founders, or to give rise to foreign jealousies or suspicions; and it was taken both in this country and abroad to indicate the presence of activity, foresight, and resolution at the head of our affairs. The House and the country now look with eager interest to the utterances of Her Majesty's Government upon the subject. Their action will, doubtless, be subjected to the severest criticism; but I do not hesitate to express my conviction that the verdict will be one of approval, and that it will be held that Ministers have, by this bold but peaceful stroke of policy, strengthened the position and vindicated the dignity of the Empire.

Antagonism, Sir, of race and religion, which is so important a factor in all Eastern questions, is again giving great cause for anxiety in some of the Provinces of Turkey in Europe. An insurrection, which has, happily, not extended beyond the limits of Bosnia and Herzegovina, has been excited by the long unredressed grievances, principally agrarian, under which the Christian population in those Provinces have suffered. The Government of the Sultan has failed to offer reforms which would satisfy the insurgents, and has been unable to put an end to the insurrection by force of arms. Accordingly, the three Northern Powers, who have all along been endeavouring to bring about a peaceful settlement of the difficulty, have invited the Western Powers to concur in a Note which should, in a friendly manner but with explicit firmness, invite the Porte to the establishment of certain specific reforms—these reforms being, in the opinion of the Powers, the minimum which could be expected to satisfy the insurgents, to effect a permanent and not a delusive cure, and to remove the dangers to which the Powers most nearly concerned are exposed. I do not doubt, Sir, that it will be thought that Her Majesty's Government has pursued a wise and prudent policy in giving a general support to Count Andrássy's Note. The initiative has been most naturally and properly taken by Austria and the two neighbouring Powers; but a consideration of our whole Eastern interests in their broadest sense shows that it was almost impossible for us to stand aloof, had we even wished it; while the approval and concurrence of England, whose history is so full of friendliness towards the authority and Empire of the Sultan, would seem to be a further guarantee that the requests so proffered are reasonable and moderate, and to give additional reason for the hope that this friendly intervention will be successful. Our expectations as to the effect of that Note seem, fortunately, to have been so far realized, and we may hope that we may now look with confidence to the action of the Powers most directly interested to assist in re-assuring the peace of Europe.

Sir, the responsibilities which attach to the position which we hold among Nations have been this year pressed forcibly home to the most indifferent spectator of events by the prominence which circumstances have lately given to our relations to Slavery and the Slave Trade. For many years we have set ourselves a noble task, and have been expending money and lives in suppressing, so far as we could, the infamous traffic in human life which is still the disgrace of many parts of the world. Wherever we have had the control over it we have abolished—sometimes at heavy cost, but a cost we have never grudged—the institution of Slavery, so that it is our proud boast that the slave who sets his foot on British soil, or upon a British ship on the high seas, is at once a free man. There are still, however, some independent Powers which tolerate or maintain the institution of Slavery, and with many of these we are of necessity brought into contact—with some of them we have treaty engagements. It is perfectly obvious, therefore, that the doctrine elsewhere so easy of application is surrounded with delicate complications when our ships, being in the territorial waters of such countries, become bound by the obligations not only of international law, but of international comity. To have carried our practice as far as some persons would seem to wish we had done would have, I will venture to say, involved us in more than one war, and that not with unimportant only or least powerful nations. We have, in fact, Sir, to consider, not so much what we should wish to do were our Empire absolutely universal, but what our power—great indeed, but still limited—will permit us to do; and for this reason I believe that the Government have been well advised in taking the course which they propose in order to ascertain with accuracy the extent of our existing powers and obligations. It is well that the extremely imperfect information which prevails upon this subject should be supplemented, and that the whole country should be completely and thoroughly aware how we stand in this matter; for so only can the action of the Executive in cases often very difficult and complicated be fairly and adequately judged by public opinion—so best will their hands be strengthened in carrying out to the fullest practicable extent the glorious traditional policy of this country.

The House will not be surprised to learn that Her Majesty's Government contemplate legislation this Session on the subject of Merchant Shipping, and it may, no doubt, be anticipated that it is intended to put this measure, or these measures, in the forefront of the legislation of the Session. No Government, indeed, could afford to ignore the state of public feeling throughout the country upon this subject. But in this state of public feeling lies also their opportunity, and it appears to be a peculiarly favourable one; for if, on the one hand, there has been set going—in a manner familiar to us all, and one calculated to do infinite honour to the feelings, at all events, and impulses of its principal originator—if there has been set going under these circumstances a motive power the value of which can hardly be overstated, it is also, happily, the case that the passions and prejudices which have on some sides, naturally perhaps, been aroused, have had time to calm so that this House approaches the discussion enriched by much experience and backed by public sentiment which is, perhaps, all the more strong because it is less demonstrative. It cannot, I think, be sustained that our mercantile navy, has deteriorated, whether in regard to its officers, its safety of carriage, or the estimation in which it is held by foreign countries. There is, however, unhappily reason to believe both that the condition of the sailors is unsatisfactory and that some part of the annual loss at sea is preventible. It is this latter point—the condition, that is of the ship—which is, perhaps, most before the mind of the public; but I may be permitted to express a hope that the other point may not be forgotten, and that measures may be taken, so far as by legislation it is possible, to increase the supply and improve the circumstances of the men—especially in our sailing vessels—upon the efficiency of whom the security of a voyage so much depends. In dealing with the other branch of the subject, it will not, I trust, be considered presumptuous in me if I venture to enforce the necessity of bearing in mind one great principle which should, as it seems to me, guide this and indeed all legislation. It has been hitherto, so far as I have observed, the uniform policy of Her Majesty's Government—and I doubt not we may confidently reckon upon its continuance—to require those who have the most personal interest and experience in the particular subject-matter to be responsible for effecting any result which the Legislation declares desirable, and then to maintain a Government control over that responsibility. In this case it is the shipowner, and the shipowner only, who can look effectually to the safety of the ship, and it should, therefore, be our policy to seek to make his responsibility a reality. We may, perhaps, do something—though it will, I fear, be a difficult and hazardous attempt—in the way of preventing insurance being a temptation to negligence or crime; but, our object being to see that the dishonest shipowner does that which the honest shipowner already does, we must rely in the end upon the enforcement of his liability. From this point of view we should be very careful not to impose regulations or precautions of too minute or too rigid a character. We should put all facilities for securing safety in the way of the owner, and remove as far as we can all hindrances: we should simplify and consolidate the law which he has to obey, and, being then in a better position to provide for a greater degree of publicity and liability, we might confidently hope to eradicate much of that which now casts some discredit upon a noble profession.

Sir, speaking on behalf of a constituency in the main agricultural, I rejoice that among the few home topics in Her Majesty's Speech there has been found place for the subject of Primary Education, and for the promise of some further relief to Local Burdens. Let me say this only—for I fear to weary the House—on this latter point. I take it as a happy augury that Her Majesty's Ministers have seen their way to this mention of it. I trust it may be the prelude to a determined effort—of which I believe they are well capable—not only to redress inequalities in taxation, but to bring simplicity and order into the chaos of local management. The Agricultural Children's Act, passed as it was with the best possible intentions, has not been absolutely a dead letter, but still may be said to have been almost inoperative. As far as those whom I have the honour to represent are concerned—if the House will allow me to make this one allusion personal to them—I will venture to assert that such an Act was not required for the children of the Northumbrian peasant. That it was demanded in some other parts—perhaps most parts—of England was and is, unhappily, the case; and I trust, therefore, that whatever measure may be passed, whether to improve this Act or to supplement the main Act of 1870, that it will be an operative one, while it is at the same time of such elasticity as not to inflict unnecessary machinery or expense upon districts where it is not required.

Mr. Ridley

Sir, there is one other topic in Her Majesty's Speech to which it would ill-become me not to allude. Anything which concerns the welfare of the place, be it school or be it University, where so many of his not least enjoyable days were passed, and to which he owes so large a debt of gratitude for anything that may be useful in his maturer life, must always command the sympathies and interests of every man; and that sympathy and those interests cannot but be intensified when they are bound up with the well-being of either of our great English Universities, which have exercised so deep an influence upon our national history. Every Oxford or Cambridge man, and more especially, perhaps, any one whose direct connection with his old college has been only recently severed, must have been watching with close interest the efforts which have been going on within those old walls with which he is so familiar to increase their utility to the nation, no less than the growing interest which has been taken in them by the outside public, by whom their system, their discipline, and their constitution have been hitherto, perhaps, but little understood. Such a man will hail with satisfaction any legislation which will conduce to the more profitable employment of the endowments, the extent of which has now been accurately ascertained. But he will trust, too, that Parliament will touch these old institutions with a tender hand; that it will enact enabling and not restrictive measures; that it will not do anything towards destroying the independence or usefulness of the collegiate system, while it aims at making these Universities the centres of study and the homes of the highest scientific and literary research.

Sir, the Session which has this day been inaugurated is not one which appears likely to be characterized by history as one which has witnessed numerous large domestic reforms. That it will see much useful work in this direction is the hope and trust of all of us; but in the meanwhile it opens upon us with the prospect of being signalized by wider deliberations, which will call forth the greatest qualities of debate, and display to a fuller extent than for years past the power and dignity of the Imperial Parliament. For myself, I have felt most deeply sensible of the grave responsibility under which I have attempted to fulfil the duty which I have undertaken, and of the kind and forbearing indulgence which the House has extended to me in performing it. I thank them most heartily for this favour received at their hands, and will conclude by moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, in answer to and in the terms of Her Majesty's gracious Speech from the Throne. The hon. Member accordingly moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to thank Her Majesty for the Most Gracious Speech which Her Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be of a cordial character:

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty has considered it Her duty not to stand aloof from the efforts now being made by allied and friendly Governments to bring about a pacification of the disturbed districts of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and that Her Majesty has accordingly, while respecting the independence of the Porte, joined in urging on the Sultan the expediency of adopting such measures of administrative reform as may remove all reasonable cause of discontent on the part of his Christian subjects:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty has agreed to purchase, subject to the sanction of Parliament, the shares which belonged to the Khedive of Egypt in the Suez Canal:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the representations which have been addressed to the Chinese Government, as to the attack made in the course of last year on the Expedition sent from Burmah to the Western Provinces of China, have been received in a friendly spirit, and that the circumstances of that lamentable outrage are now the subject of an inquiry:

"To assure Her Majesty that we rejoice to learn that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has enjoyed uninterrupted health during his journey through India, and that we join in regarding the hearty affection with which he has been received by Her Majesty's Indian subjects as an assurance that they are happy under Her Majesty's rule, and loyal to Her Throne:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for reminding us that at the time the direct Government of Her Majesty's Indian Empire was transferred to the Crown, no formal addition was made to the style and titles of the Sovereign, and for informing us that Her Majesty deems the present a fitting opportunity for supplying the omission.

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that directions have been given for the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into all Treaty engagements and other International obligations bearing upon the subject of the Slave Trade, and the action of British national ships in the territorial waters of foreign States, with a view to ascertain whether any steps ought to be taken to secure for Her Majesty's ships and their commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that a Bill will be introduced for the punishment of Slave Traders who are subjects of Native Indian Princes:

"To assure Her Majesty that we rejoice to learn that the general prosperity of Her Colonial Empire has continued to advance:

"To join with Her Majesty in trusting that the operations of Her Majesty's troops in Malay have restored order and re-established the just influence and authority of this Country:

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for directing the Estimates of the year to be prepared and presented without delay:

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that our careful consideration shall be given to the measures which may be submitted to us, and that we earnestly join in Her Majesty's prayer that our deliberations may, under the Divine blessing, result in the happiness and contentment of Her Majesty's people."

MR. MULHOLLAND: Mr. Speaker—Sir, I rise to second the Address which has just been read and moved so eloquently by the hon. Member for North Northumberland; and, in so doing, I have the pleasure at the outset of adding my testimony to that of the hon. Member as to the great satisfaction that has been felt, not only, I believe, by all the Members of this House, but by all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, at Her Majesty's most gracious presence to-day. When we last assembled here on a similar occasion, there was a deep and sincere sympathy for the cause which then deprived us of that most gracious presence; that cause happily no longer exists, and I am sure that I express a unanimous feeling, when I say that on this occasion the pleasure is not less intense and universal. I do not propose, following as I do the hon. Member who has moved the Address, to refer to the various topics in Her Majesty's Speech with the same completeness of detail in which they have been already brought before the notice of the House in his eloquent speech. To do so would be to travel again over much of the same ground, which, although to some extent inevitable, I desire as much as possible to avoid. But even at the risk of repetition, the subject of our foreign relations is too important not to be alluded to in its usual order of precedence. There has been sometimes a tendency to forget the intricacy and closeness of the ties which, notwithstanding our insular position, bind our interests and those of foreign countries together. If politically we may seem of all nations the most independent, yet commercially, from the extent and ramifications of our trade, our interests are the most diffused and interwoven with those of others, and foreign complications would be the sure prelude to commercial disturbance and social distress at home. Self-interest, therefore, not less than higher considerations, demands that England should not pursue a policy of isolation; that she should not abdicate her place among the great European Powers, but should hold it with firmness and dignity. Such has been the attitude of Her Majesty's Government; and the satisfaction will be general in learning that as a result Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers continue to be of a cordial nature. The influence of this country thus acquired and retained will no doubt continue to be exerted—as it has been hitherto—to promote the cause of justice and the preservation of peace. Although the clouds show some signs of breaking—and I hope may soon be dispersed—the political horizon is not so serene as it was during the last Session of Parliament. The insurrection that has broken out in one of the Turkish provinces, as referred to in Her Majesty's Speech, was not, apparently, of itself important; but that Empire contains so much explosive material that any disturbance, however local, must necessarily cause uneasiness. Even those who believe that the existing position of affairs in Turkey is not satisfactory, nor likely to be permanent, may well fear that any alternative at present possible would be still more pregnant with danger. It will, therefore, be considered a source of congratulation that Her Majesty has used her influence in conjunction with the other Great Powers, not only towards the removal of any grievances of which the Christian subjects of the Porte may have cause to complain, but also for the preservation of the independence of the Ottoman Empire. England is interested in the maintenance of good government, peace, and order in the East of Europe, not only as the greatest commercial nation, not only as a great European, but as a great Asiatic Power. The Turkish Empire lies between us and India, and events that might disturb the peace of such a highway would be to England events of direct and vital concern. This is true, especially with regard to Egypt. A few years ago the genius of an eminent French engineer, by piercing the narrow strip of land that connects Africa with Asia, reversed the revolution that had been previously effected by Vasco de Gama, and restored to its ancient and apparently natural channel, the commerce between Europe and the East. The importance of the complete freedom of such a passage once opened is universal, but to England it is supreme. The key of it ought not to be entrusted to any private—not even to any national—keeping, for it is a matter of international concern. It was, therefore, with an unexampled warmth and unanimity of approval that the people of this country received the intelligence of the provisional purchase by Her Majesty's Government of the Khedive of Egypt's interest in the Suez Canal. Sir, I have no doubt that the House will approve and confirm that purchase. It must be remembered that the alternative was not whether this large share of the ownership of a Canal that to England is an artery of her life-blood should be retained by the Khedive or acquired by us—it was whether it should be acquired by us, or by another nation. It was natural that after the first enthusiasm excited by the intelligence of the purchase had somewhat subsided, the ingenuity of hostile criticism should seek to depreciate the bargain. Although it is commerce that will be most directly benefited, we must look at it, not as a commercial but as a political transaction; and when it is asked in what way will our position be improved by a part ownership of the Canal, the instinct of the country, wiser than the critics, replies, that in the event of danger from any cause threatening the freedom of the passage, our national influence must be thereby increased; and that if the international freedom of the Canal has not been secured, at least a most important step has been taken towards its ultimate security. Sir, I believe that I echo the national conviction when I say that the country is indebted to Her Majesty's Government for the vigour and courage shown at a critical moment, in assuming the responsibility of an act for which there could be no precedent, because the occasion was unprecedented. It will be now clearly understood that England considers India a vital part of the Empire, and that she will not shrink from any effort or any sacrifice that may be necessary for its preservation. When during last Session it was announced that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was about to visit India, the announcement was received with unmingled pleasure. The results of that visit appear to have even exceeded our expectations. We rejoice to learn from Her Majesty that it has not injured the health of His Royal Highness, and his presence has shown or evoked a feeling of personal loyalty among all classes of the Native population for which we were perhaps scarcely prepared. It has also, by bringing together in the State ceremonies the different Native Princes, probably given them a common pride in the greatness of the Empire—a greatness of which, as dignitaries, they themselves to some extent partake. We, too, when we have read of the assemblage of those feudatory Princes, have perhaps realized the greatness of that Eastern Empire as we never realized it before. The well-known tact and courtesy of His Royal Highness have produced in India the best effects, and in England the result of his visit will not be less beneficial if it lead us to take more interest in that great country, to realize more truly its extent and importance, and if it unites us in a closer sympathy with our fellow-subjects there. The time, therefore, seems to have been happily chosen for Her Majesty to crown this great Empire that we have built up in the East, by assuming a title long foreshadowed by events. That Her Majesty should now become Empress of India, in fact as she has long been in name, will be accepted as a graceful symbol of the more intimate connection that we hope may follow the visit of Her Royal son. It is possible to underrate the influence of imagination in national affairs—with an Oriental people it may be difficult to overrate it; and I can conceive nothing more likely to kindle and preserve a national sentiment of loyalty among our fellow-subjects in India than this direct connection with the August Head of our ancient Monarchy by a yet more splendid title. Satisfactory as may be the position of affairs in India, it is gratifying to learn from Her Majesty that the condition of our great and extended Colonial Empire is equally prosperous. We now justly estimate the value of our Colonies; commercially and politically they are pillars of our Empire, and our union with them is secured by ties stronger and more permanent than those of mere self-interest—the ties of a common loyalty and a common blood. I hope that these feelings may always be cherished as giving our Colonies a value that, marvellous as their material progress is, no statistics can express. The House will have been prepared for the announcement that a measure will be introduced during the Session with reference to Local Taxation. I am not, of course, in the confidence of the Government as to the nature of the proposed Bill; but it will probably be of the same tendency as that which recently received the approval of the House. The principle appears reasonable and just, that expenditure for purposes essentially Imperial, ought not to be borne exclusively by any one species of property, but ought to be shared equally by all. A reform of this kind may, I hope, eventually be followed by endeavours to effect a greater uniformity of valuation and a greater consolidation of administration and of rates. I trust, Sir, that when the proposed measure for the amendment of the Merchant Shipping Laws is laid before the House, it will receive the earnest and unprejudiced attention of all Members, without distinction of Party, with reference to a settlement of that difficult question. Last Session the feelings of the country were much excited by it; but I think it was wisely determined that final legislation on a subject of such national importance should be preceded by the most careful and deliberate inquiry. No one could read the statistics of the losses of life at sea without emotion, and everyone must desire to protect our seamen from unnecessary risks, but no legislation can altogether eliminate danger from their calling, and excessive or unwise interference with our shipping might inflict a national injury that could never be repaired. Among the many causes of the losses we deplore, not the least fatal is the want of a sufficient supply of good seamen, and I hope that one of the remedies adopted may be an extension of the system of training ships upon our coasts. Sir, I congratulate the House upon the omission from Her Majesty's Speech of any reference to the affairs of Ireland, that part of the Kingdom with which I am myself more especially connected. Ireland is now happily so peaceable and prosperous that it is not requisite, in any reference to the state of the country, to separate her from the other parts of the United Kingdom. An excellent harvest has produced its usual effect upon an agricultural people; and the deposits in banks, the circulation of the currency, and the traffic on railways, all show an increase in the produce, the trade, and the wealth of the country. Ireland does not possess the mineral resources which lie at the foundation of England's manufacturing supremacy; but, notwithstanding this disadvantage, Ulster has appropriated one of the great staple manufactures of the Kingdom, and the Linen Trade, having suffered less than most others during the depression of the last two years, continues to give employment in its different branches to all classes of the population of Ulster, a population distinguished not more for its industry and intelligence than for its loyal attachment to the Constitution and the Throne. Advance in material prosperity has throughout Ireland been followed by a marked diminution in crime, happily justifying the relaxation made last year in the exceptional Acts previously unfortunately necessary for the preservation of the peace, and also enabling the Government to gradually restrict the area to which these Acts are applied. If attention continue to be directed to the development of the material resources of the country, increased intercourse and extended trade will, I hope, gradually convince the warmest patriot, in a land where patriotism is the strongest sentiment, that he will be most patriotic when he draws as closely as possible the ties by which nature has inseparably connected the destiny of Ireland with that of England, and has made her a part of the richest, the greatest, and the freest nation in the world. Her Majesty has again brought before our attention a subject that was last year also alluded to in the Speech from the Throne, and that will ever excite the greatest interest in this country—the continued efforts for the suppression of the Slave Trade. If there are defects or ambiguities in our treaties with foreign Powers or in International Law tending to obstruct those efforts, those treaties or that law should be amended or explained, and I have no doubt that this House will approve of the appointment of a Royal Commission to investigate the subject. This is no Party question; upon it every Member of this House can have but the one desire, the discouragement of Slavery, as opposed equally to civilization and Christianity, and the extinction of the Slave Trade as a disgrace to mankind. I will not detain the House by further reference to the other subjects specially mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech, as they have been already effectively dealt with by the hon. Member who preceded me. But allusion is made in that Speech to important measures which may be brought before us during the Session, if time should permit. I think it was a wise discretion to refrain from enumerating these measures in detail, as we know well that unforeseen difficulties often intervene, and a sanguine forecast is an unnecessary temptation of fortune. If circumstances should allow their introduction of those measures, it will no doubt be found that Her Majesty's Government continue to direct their efforts in domestic legislation to the improvement of the social and sanitary condition of the people. What they have attempted in this direction has hitherto met with the approval of this House, and the results have earned the approbation of the country. Sir, I believe that it is the earnest wish of all parties in this House to elevate the condition of that teeming population, whose numbers and rapid increase affix upon us all a grave responsibility. Where there are differences among us, they are chiefly as to the means to be employed. I trust, therefore, the measures referred to may be successfully passed, and may prove as effective as those that in this Parliament we have already enacted. I trust also that the knowledge that it is the policy of the Government and the desire of all parties in the State to promote, so far as legislation can promote, the education, the advancement, and the moral and physical well-being of the people, may diffuse such confidence in our institutions as to prevent the disturbance of this beneficial progress by agitation for organic change. Sir, I feel deeply indebted to the House for the patience with which it has heard me. If I did not bespeak it, it was merely because I knew that on such occasions as this the indulgence ever outruns the demand.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That, &c." [See p. 62.]

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Mr. Speaker, the topics which have been adverted to in Her Majesty's gracious Speech are numerous and important—and as we have been already reminded more important than those which have been brought under the consideration of Parliament for some time. But numerous and important as those topics are, there are few, if any, I think, which, with the amount of information before us, can be adequately discussed, and, certainly, there are none of them on which this House can reasonably be expected to pronounce this evening a final opinion. Parliament has, on other occasions, assembled under very different circumstances. The Speech from the Throne on some of those occasions may have announced the commencement or the progress of a war, or the commencement or progress of negotiations. On the other hand, it may have announced the intention of the Government to propose some great changes, in which great principles affecting the Constitution of the country were involved. In such instances it may have been impossible for the House to vote the Address to the Crown without amendment, or certainly without full and adequate discussion, without more or less pledging itself to the policy which had been submitted to it by the Government. But in this case, and on the present occasion, the legislation which the Government proposes, important though it may be, does not I think—at first sight at any rate—involve the consideration of any large principles to which the House can be committed; and important as are the announcements which have been made in respect to our foreign relations, we are as yet without such information as would enable us adequately to discuss the questions to which they relate. It will, therefore, be the duty of the House to wait until the Papers upon the subjects that are promised are laid before us, and we have had time not only to read, but to consider them before proceeding to a discussion of the subjects to which they refer. I admit that much information, in addition to that contained in the Queen's Speech, has been given to us in the able speeches of the hon. Gentlemen the Mover and Seconder of the Address. The House will, I am sure, agree with me that seldom or never has the very difficult task of moving and seconding the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne been performed with greater talent than on the present occasion. That, however, will not, I think, affect the considerations which I have mentioned. The House will no doubt also agree with me, that in any observations which it will be my duty to make upon the Address which has been moved, it will be rather my duty to endeavour to elicit information from the Government upon points which may seem to require explanation, and also to afford to the Government an opportunity of removing misconceptions in some case, where their policy has, as I think it has, been misunderstood.

The first subject which has been mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech as calling for legislative action is a measure for regulating the Ultimate Tribunal of Appeal in the United Kingdom. This is an imperative duty which is cast upon the Government after the legislation of last year; but I fear that the Government will not recommend to us the adoption of that powerful, efficient, and most convenient tribunal which once received the sanction of both branches of the Legislature, but which, for some inexplicable reason, the Government last year recommended should not be entrusted with the functions of a Court of Final Appeal. However that may be, it is of the utmost importance that this question should now be set at rest; that the Courts of Law should be able to devote their undivided attention to putting in operation the great changes which have recently been made in our system of Judicature; and that the attention of the public, the Judges, and the profession should no longer be distracted by doubt and uncertainty as to what the Ultimate Court of Appeal is to be.

Merchant Shipping legislation is also expected by Parliament and the country. The Report of the Royal Commission and the discussions which arose in this House and in the country during the last Session have, I think, done much to clear the way of the Government with reference to the introduction of this measure; and I do not think, therefore, that the Government will fall into either of the mistakes which they made last year. They will neither underrate the difficulties with which the subject is surrounded, nor the interest with which the subject is regarded by the House and the country. As has been remarked by the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Address, the interest which was manifested on this subject in the country during the last Session of Parliament has been adequately sustained during the Recess, and the tone which has animated the discussion, both on the part of the shipowners—who are personally and directly interested in the subject—and of those who have more especially taken up the cause of the seamen, shows a most satisfactory desire not to interpose unnecessary difficulties, but to meet each other in a spirit of conciliation. I thought that the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Address entered into a very able consideration of the principles which ought to guide the Legislature in dealing with this question; and I do not think it necessary that I should occupy time by following him upon the subject, especially as, Notice having been given, we shall have the very earliest opportunity afforded to us of devoting our attention to the subject.

I am glad to learn from the Queen's Speech that the subject of Primary Education is to receive attention at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. No indication has yet been given of the treatment which that subject is to receive, but after the speech which was delivered by my right hon. Friend the Home

Secretary during the Recess, and after the signal success which has attended the introduction of education into a mass of places where it had been neglected before, I can scarcely doubt that the measure which will be recommended to this House will be one which will extend very greatly the benefit of education to the children of the rural districts, remedying those defects in their education by means of the compulsory teaching which is enjoyed by children of the large towns.

I shall make no remark upon the legislation proposed with regard to the Universities. We have had no intimation which would enable us to form an opinion as to the manner in which Her Majesty's Government propose to deal with that difficult question, and therefore I shall, before entering upon it, await such fuller explanation as may be forthcoming. I cannot, however, help referring here to some omissions in the list of measures which are to be proposed to Parliament which must have struck every one. The subject of the prevention of the pollution of rivers occupied a place in the Speech of last year; and, in addition to that, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board gave us very strong reason to hope that the Government would be prepared this year to deal with the question of the supply of water. The legislation for the improvement of the sanitary condition of the people which has been so long and so often promised by Her Majesty's Government can hardly be supposed to be exhausted by the Consolidation Act which was passed last year; but, nevertheless, not one of these subjects receives notice in Her Majesty's present Speech. I think we are entitled to ask why the Pollution of Rivers Bill has been dropped, and why none of the other measures are referred to in Her Majesty's Speech. Are they not matters that demand and deserve the earnest consideration of the House? In my opinion, it is because Her Majesty's Government shrink from dealing with that which they, and we, know to be the root and foundation of successful treatment of any such subject. They know that the country feels more strongly year by year that the Central Government cannot adequately provide for all the wants of our vast and increasing population, which lives under conditions and difficulties so different and circumstances so varying in their character. Year by year public opinion becomes more convinced than ever that our system of local self-government has not kept pace with the wants of the increasing population; and year by year, in some respects, our local institutions are becoming less adapted to their purposes than they were under the conditions in which our ancestors left them. Now, if the Government would attempt to reduce to something like order the confusion which prevails in local institutions in rural districts; if they would attempt to extend to rural communities, and especially to communities which are semi-rural and semi-urban, the advantages and privileges which are possessed to a very great extent by the inhabitants of larger towns; and if they were to attempt to bring into more reasonable and harmonious relations the various local governing bodies, they would be able to do more for the improvement of the condition of the country and the sanitary condition of the people than they can hope to do by the exertions of the Central Government.

Sir, Her Majesty has referred, in terms of satisfaction, to the condition of our colonial Empire. The Government have on various occasions taken great credit to themselves for their colonial policy, and praise has been freely given to them in that respect. I do not grudge them the credit for that policy, but I do maintain that their colonial policy is not an invention of their own. They take great credit to themselves for the exertions they have made in promoting the federation of the South African States. I do not grudge them the credit for that, but it must not be forgotten that the negotiations which ultimately resulted in the confederation of the North American Colonies were begun under a Liberal Government; and that, although they were completed by a Conservative Government, they were initiated and received their first assistance at the hands of Liberals. While they are taking credit for their colonial policy, it is incumbent upon the Government to explain—and I am glad that Papers are to be presented to Parliament which will afford the explanation—what has been the nature of their policy with regard to this South African Federation. As far as I have heard, and as we are informed, a gentleman has been sent there, armed with powers of which we do not know the precise nature, but who has taken the somewhat unusual course of agitating the colony against its responsible Government. I can hardly think that a course of policy approved of by the Government as the favourable commencement of a policy which aims, I presume, not only to form a closer connection between the South African colonies, but a closer connection with ourselves.

I must next refer for a short time to the remarkable paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech which deals with the subject of Slavery and our relations with slave-holding countries. It will hardly be denied that the paragraph owes its introduction into the Speech to the discussions which have arisen during the Recess upon the two Circulars on the subject of Fugitive Slaves which have been issued by the Government. These Circulars have been discussed throughout the country, not, perhaps, with full knowledge of all the questions of international law involved, and possibly not even with a full knowledge of our own municipal law as it affected, or was affected by, the question. But, at the same time, they have been discussed in a spirit which I think this House will admire, inasmuch as it shows an unabated pride on the part of the country in the result of its exertions for the suppression of the Slave Trade and a determination on its part not to relax those exertions unduly. I need not say much with regard to the first Circular, as it has been withdrawn, and we know, on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it never received the approval of the Cabinet. As I say, the Circular has been withdrawn and much of the legal doctrine set forth in it has been reversed, because we find that, by the second Circular, not only under no circumstances is a slave received on board one of Her Majesty's ships on the high seas to be restored to the country from which he escaped, but also that when a slave is once received on board one of Her Majesty's ships in a port or elsewhere within the territorial limits of a friendly country, no demand is to be entertained for his surrender and no inquiry is to be made into his status. Thus, two of the propositions which were laid down in the first Circular have been directly contradicted in the second Circular. It would, perhaps, be a curious topic of inquiry how the first Circular came to pass through the ordeal of an examination by the Foreign Office, by the Law Officers of the Crown, and by the Admiralty; but with regard to both Circulars the question arises—What was the necessity for issuing either of them at all, and why, when the first was withdrawn, did Her Majesty's Government think it necessary to reverse the legal doctrines laid down in the first by issuing the second Circular? I am not prepared to say that the instructions contained in the second Circular are inconsistent with any principles either of international or of our own law, nor am I prepared to say that they are inconsistent with the precedents which may be found in the practices of former Governments. I think it is perfectly true that a distinction has always been drawn—a distinction of which Parliament and the country is fully aware, and which must be known even to the Anti-slavery Society itself—between the Slave Trade and domestic slavery. The Instructions of the Admiralty directed the commanders of our ships to explain to the inhabitants of countries whose ports they visited, the distinction between the Slave Trade which this country was determined to suppress, and the institution of domestic slavery with which it does not claim to interfere. But those Instructions were perfectly well known to our commanding officers, and it appears to me that it was to make an invidious distinction as against the slave to call the attention of our commanding officers, in the terms which have been employed in the second Circular, to the reception of slaves as compared with the free man. It was felt by the country, and I have no doubt that it was felt by hon. Members of this House, as it was felt by Her Majesty's Government, that the matter could not rest where it was, and therefore Her Majesty's Government have felt called upon to make what I confess I take to be one of the most extraordinary announcements to have ever been made by a Government of this country. What, Sir, has been the course of the Government in this matter? They issued one Circular, we have been told, upon the highest legal authority, and that Circular has been withdrawn. They issued a second Circular, after full and deliberate consideration by the Cabinet, and that Circular has not met with approval in the country. What course are the Government prepared to take in regard to it? Are they prepared to maintain the policy of the second Circular or are they not? Are they prepared to acknowledge a second time that they have been in error, and to withdraw the second as they did the first? No: it does not appear that they are prepared to adopt that policy. Are they prepared to say that a new policy ought to be adopted in deference to the express wishes and feelings of the country—a policy in advance of that which has been adopted by previous Governments? No, Sir, that is not the course which they are prepared to adopt; but what they are prepared to do is to fall back upon the device of appointing a Royal Commission. The Royal Commission therefore is intended to provide the Government with a policy which they are unable to find for themselves. And what is this Royal Commission to inquire into? It is to inquire into all Treaty engagements and other international obligations bearing upon this subject, and all Instructions from time to time issued to naval officers, with a view to ascertain whether any steps ought to be taken to secure for our ships and their commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty. But I presume that the Treaty engagements and other international obligations bearing upon this and other subjects are to be found in the archives of the Foreign Office, and I presume that the Legal Advisers of the Crown could inform Her Majesty's Government as to the effect of those engagements and obligations without the assistance of a Royal Commission, and I presume that the Admiralty could, without much difficulty, inform them of the nature of the Instructions which have been issued to our naval officers; and yet those are the only matters into which the Royal Commission can inquire. I think, therefore, that all the information which this Royal Commission can gather is either already or might soon be in the hands of Her Majesty's Government, and what then remains for the Commission to do? It is to ascertain as already said, whether any steps ought to be taken "to secure for my ships and their commanders abroad greater power for the maintenance of the right of personal liberty." It might be supposed that question might be determined for themselves by Her Majesty's Government. The answer to that question has been already given by the country. It knows perfectly well what it wants, and if the Government does not know, the country, in my opinion, is perfectly prepared to tell them. It does not wish for our ships to be made the refuges for escaped domestic slaves or for political refugees in every port which they may visit, nor does it want that they should be made asylums for distressed persons; but it does want in the case of a fugitive slave or of a political refugee, or of persons in distress, whatever the circumstances may be, that the discretion of our commanding officers should not be fettered by invidious rules, such as those contained in the second Circular, but that they should continue to be, as heretofore, the judges of the circumstances under which the slaves or freemen are to be received on board Her Majesty's ships and to receive the protection of the British flag. The country wants that not only the slave whose life may be in danger should be received on board Her Majesty's ships, but the slave woman, whose personal honour may be endangered, and the slave in danger of cruel punishment, should be received. The country thinks—and I think rightly—that this is a discretion which may be well and safely trusted to Her Majesty's officers. They are not to receive needlessly persons for whose reception Her Majesty's ships are not intended, nor to interfere needlessly with the domestic institutions of the country, but they may be allowed to judge of the circumstances of the case in the future as in the past. Further, the country wants, I think, that when, for sufficient cause, a fugitive slave has been received on board, under the protection of the British flag, that slave shall not be surrendered, or restored to slavery, or removed from Her Majesty's ship under any pretext or upon any demand whatever. That, I believe, is what the country demands, and what I think this House will require, and if international engagements and obligations stand in the way, I think that the House and the country will call upon Her Majesty's Government, without delay, to use their best efforts to remove these obstacles without resorting to the intermediate process of a Royal Commission. We know perfectly well what is the effect of the appointment of these Royal Commissions, when there is really nothing the Commissioners can recommend, and it is simply a question of policy to be undertaken. We had an example of the sort of assistance that a Royal Commission furnishes to the Government in the case of the question relating to employers and workmen, a very difficult subject requiring the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and which was referred to a Royal Commission. There the facts of the case were already well-known; but, as Her Majesty's Government were not prepared to deal with the question, they referred it to a Royal Commission. The Commission furnished the Government with very little additional information, but the Commissioners made some valuable recommendations in their Report. Those recommendations, however, were entirely thrown over by the Government, and therefore the only result of the appointment of the Commission was—what it will be in this case—to obtain a short respite for the Government and, what they wanted particularly, a further delay. I hope, however, that Her Majesty's Government will, at all events in the present case, be able to assure us that the second as well as the first Circular will be suspended pending the inquiry by the Royal Commission, and until the Government have had an opportunity of making up their minds what they will do with regard to this subject.

I now advert to the paragraph which mentions the state of our foreign relations. Her Majesty informs us that events have taken place which have again brought to notice what is known as "the Eastern Question." There is no doubt the events of last autumn—the insurrection in Bosnia and in Herzegovina, and the partial repudiation of its Debt and engagements by the Turkish Government—have produced a great change in the feeling of the people of this country in regard to the Turkish Government. The insurrection has shown, at all events, that the Turkish Government has not been able to conciliate the goodwill and loyalty of its subjects. The reports which have been received through the Press in consequence of that insurrection have shown that in many Provinces of Turkey great misgovernment and consequently great disturbance still exist. The partial repudiation of its Debt, to which I have referred, has reminded us that Turkey has embarked upon a career of maladministration and extravagance which if persisted in, must defy all the efforts of European States to save her. It is not extraordinary then that such events as these should have produced a great change in the public opinion of this country, but I think it would be a mistake if we manifest too much impatience in regard to these events. No doubt many among us have been disappointed at the results of the last 20 years—results so different from those which were expected to follow the exertions which were made in the Russian War on behalf of Turkey. But I think the House will forgive me if I quote some words which were spoken in this House in 1856 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). Speaking in this House on the 6th of May, on the General Treaty of Paris, my right hon. Friend said—

"Great Britain and France have not yet been able to afford a complete solution to the problem which has existed for 600 or 700 years. It was hardly a century and a-half ago when a Mahomedan Empire carried pillage, carnage, and terror throughout Europe; and now, since it has ceased to be an object of fear, it has become the principal cause of anxiety and solicitude to Europe. The juxtaposition of a people professing the Mahomedan religion with a rising Christian population, having adverse and conflicting influences, presents difficulties which are not to be overcome by certain diplomatists at certain hours and in a certain place. It will be the work and care of many generations—if even then they were successful—to bring that state of things to a happy and prosperous conclusion." —[3 Hansard, cxlii. 93.]

It seems to me, Sir, that those words are as true now as they were 20 years ago, and they seem to me to convey to the House a salutary and somewhat needed warning against undue impatience with regard to the events which have recently occurred. No doubt a step has been taken towards a solution of the difficulty, though not in the direction which was indicated by Lord Palmerston—namely, in the direction of the reform of the administration of the Turkish Government; but it is a step which is as likely ultimately to favour a solution of the difficulty, being a step in the direction of increasing the independence of the Christian subjects of the Porte. Her Majesty's Government say that Papers are to be laid before you respecting their action in supporting the Note presented by the Austrian Government. The House, I think, will wait till the full text of the Note is before them, and it is able to appreciate the exact amount and extent of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. Before giving any opinion upon the action of the Government, I am not disposed to raise any preliminary objection to the action which Her Majesty's Government has taken. I have no doubt that, as far as it was in their power, they have taken steps to maintain the independence of the Porte. I even think the Members of the Government who concluded the Treaty of Peace of 1856, provided the interference was of a proper and respectable character, would not have objected to the interference which has taken place. Lord Palmerston, who was himself one of the greatest supporters of the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire, would not have been averse to such interference as appears to have taken place. Speaking of the Firman referred to in the Treaty of Paris, that noble Lord said—

"In fact, that it should be revoked is a thing which I hold to be as impossible almost, morally speaking, as that the sun should go backwards. That which is more possible, however, is that, for some time to come, cases will arise in which the Firman will not be fully executed by the authorities of the Porte in distant provinces, and in places not immediately under the view of the Consuls; and if that should occur, the fact of the Firman having been adverted to in the Treaty, and the issuing of it having been recorded in the Treaty, would give to the Allied Powers that moral right of diplomatic interference and of remonstrance with the Sultan which I am perfectly convinced would be quite sufficient to accomplish the desired purpose."—
[3 Hansard, cxlii. 125-6.]

We can hardly say that the contingency anticipated by Lord Palmerston has not arrived, and that something more than Lord Palmerston anticipated has not happened. Indeed, it may be almost said that the Firman to which Lord Palmerston alluded has not been put into execution at all. Well, then, according to Lord Palmerston, the right of the Powers to intervene diplomatically is preserved, and I trust that the Papers to be laid on the Table of the House will show that the intervention has not exceeded those limits pointed out by Lord Palmerston on that occasion.

Before I sit down I wish to make one or two observations upon the purchase, referred to by Her Majesty, of shares of the Khedive in the Suez Canal. I hardly know, Sir, whether I ought to allude to this transaction as being connected with the Eastern Question. But if I regard the time when the purchase was made, when the great Northern Powers appeared to suppose that they could take the affairs of Turkey into their own hands without much consultation with the other Powers of Europe, if I take into account the almost unanimous opinion expressed by the Press, and by the public generally where opportunity has been given, I should say that this purchase was intimately connected with the Eastern Question. But, on the other hand, if I take the words of Lord Derby, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, at Edinburgh, I am forced to come to the conclusion that the purchase had no connection whatever with the Eastern Question; that it was undertaken solely upon its own merits; that it would have been undertaken last year before the Eastern Question had arisen, or it might have been undertaken next year after the Eastern Question is settled, if the opportunity had arisen. Well, Sir, in this conflict of evidence, I for one have no hesitation which way to decide. Lord Derby says that all foreign nations are in the habit of believing what we say; and if foreign nations are in the habit of believing what our Government says, much more is the House of Commons in the habit of believing the clear explanations of Her Majesty's Government. Therefore, though I do not say for one moment that this purchase may not have consequences far wider and greater than were referred to by Lord Derby, or than the consequences which, according to Lord Derby, determined the Government to undertake the transaction, these consequences may or may not have been foreseen by the Government; but I will take from Lord Derby that the purchase was determined on considerations altogether irrespective of what is called "the Eastern Question." I prefer in my remarks on the subject to touch the matter from the Government point of view, and to endeavour to obtain from the Government some explanation of the transaction on their own basis. This perhaps is the proper time, and it may be the only time, when one or two observations may be made upon the conduct of the Government in not at once resorting to the advice of Parliament for the confirmation of their action in this matter. The transaction was one of sufficient importance to have justified that course. The sum involved, although perhaps not a large sum in proportion to the interests at stake and the objects in view, was nevertheless not an inconsiderable sum, and when we consider the jealousy with which this House insists that every small item of the ordinary national expenditure, which varies little from year to year, should be submitted to the rigid scrutiny of this House, it does seem extraordinary that a day's unnecessary delay should have been allowed to elapse before the opinion of the House of Commons was taken on this large, extraordinary, and altogether unprecedented purchase. I may be told that the decision of the Government had to be an immediate decision; that Parliament is not more pledged now than it would have been in December to reject or confirm the transaction, and therefore no advantage would have been gained by an earlier summoning of Parliament. It may be true that Governments have had before now to decide grave matters on their own responsibility, sometimes even on a declaration of war, but it is, I hold, a Constitutional practice, and also a salutary practice, that in cases of this kind Parliament should be called together, though the decision of the Government may not be irrevocable, and that Parliament should have, as it has not had, the opportunity of expressing its approval of, or its dissent from, the policy of the Government. And surely there would have been very great advantage if this course, which I think the proper course, had been taken. If Parliament had been summoned and the Government had at once laid before it the exact nature of the transaction in which they were engaged, the motives which had prompted them, the objects which they intended to secure, and the use to which they intended to put the property that they had acquired, they would have prevented a great many misconceptions and many mischievous exaggerations which have prevailed both in this country and abroad. Such a course would have prevented many mischievous speculations, and would have prevented some disappointment. It would also have shown the confidence which the Government reposed in the wisdom of Parliament in resorting to their advice on an occasion of so much importance. But, taking the matter as it was explained by Lord Derby at Edinburgh, we know that what the Government wanted, and what they think they have obtained, is an additional security for that which is to us a necessity—a free and uninterrupted passage through Egypt to India. What the House and the country, I believe, desire to know is somewhat more precisely in what way they have accomplished those objects. When we speak of additional security that has been obtained, it would be as well to know, in the first place, whether we are talking of additional security in time of peace or in time of war. If you are speaking of a time of war, I fail to see what change has been made in our position by the purchase of these shares. I believe that the territorial sovereignty over the Canal belongs to the Khedive, or perhaps rather to his Suzerain the Sultan. At all events, the territorial sovereignty of the Canal is not in the hands of the country which has purchased the shares. I apprehend that in case of war, unless the Khedive were an active ally of either party, it would be his duty to close the Canal, as it would be his duty in the same way to close any other part of his dominions to the troops or the ships of either belligerent. At any rate, the Company have no control over the Canal; and therefore, if we are speaking of a time of war, it is very doubtful how far we have obtained by this purchase an uninterrupted passage through Egypt to India. Then if we are speaking of the time of peace it must be remembered that whether the shareholders are French or English or of whatever nation, a commercial company, acting on commercial principles, their object is dividend; and it is difficult to see how that dividend was to be secured if a free and uninterrupted passage through Egypt was not allowed to that State which possesses, as we are told, three-fourths of the traffic which passes through the Canal. I do not for a moment deny that questions have arisen in which the interest of the shareholders has conflicted, or has been supposed to conflict, with the interest of the shipowners. But the Government of this country has intervened, as it had a right to do, as the representative of the greatest shipowning country in the world, and it has intervened successfully, and by the interference of the Khedive and the Sultan this country has, as it was entitled to do, held the Company to the engagements to which it was bound by its concessions. I do not deny that if we had acquired the whole of the shares in the Company held in private hands, or had acquired a preponderating part of those shares, we might have had it in our power to make very great improvements in the Canal and in its administration, which might have been of great advantage not only to ourselves, but also to the other nations making use of it. But we do not know at present what share in the management of the Canal we have obtained by the purchase we have made. It appears to be certain, at all events, that in the councils of the General Assembly of the shareholders our influence is a very limited one indeed. We have never been told whether we shall be represented at all by the share we have obtained, or even, if so, to what extent, in the directorate of the Canal; and, as far as the information given to the public goes, we do not know what authority for the improvement of the Canal or of its administration has been secured by this great purchase of the Government. I also admit that if we had acquired ordinary shares of the Company—shares entitled to dividend—we might have had a very large indirect and moral influence in the management of the affairs of the Canal, though we might have had very little direct influence. But, unfortunately, the shares bought by the Government are, it seems to me, shares that do not tend to give us any influence whatever, either indirect, direct, or moral, of any kind, in the councils of the shareholders. Our influence with the shareholders, as far as I can ascertain, is of a totally distinct character from that of ordinary shareholders; for whereas the ordinary shareholders naturally desire to secure an immediate dividend, we, under any circumstances, are not entitled to any dividend for the next 19 years, and therefore our interest is not identical with, but entirely opposed to, that of the ordinary shareholders. Their interest is to postpone works for the improvement of the Canal, and to do everything to secure present profit. To us present profit is of no moment. What our interest is, is to put the Canal in the best possible condition during these 19 years. Therefore, we do not appear to have obtained in the councils of the shareholders any voice in the management of the Canal at all commensurate with our purchase, or that directly or indirectly we have acquired such an interest as some people may choose to imagine. Supposing, however, that a satisfactory answer can be given to these questions, and that the Government can clearly show that, as Lord Derby said, we have obtained additional security for our communications with India, the House will desire to look narrowly at the manner in which this has been effected. And now as to the manner in which the transaction has been carried out. It appears to me to be a mistake to say that we have paid £4,000,000 for these shares. We are not entitled to the dividends for 19 years, and I have seen it calculated—and I believe the calculation is an accurate one—that the present value of the shares we have purchased is about £1,250,000 or £1,500,000 sterling. Admitting it to be right that this country should not make an usurious bargain with the Khedive, the deferred value that we would have to pay him may be taken at £2,000,000, or, in other words, we are investing £2,000,000 for the sake of £200,000 a-year to be paid by the Khedive. No clear explanation up to the present time has been given of this transaction; but, taking it in connection with the mission of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave), it appears to mix us up in an extraordinary manner with the finances of the Khedive. Lord Derby, in his speech at Edinburgh, disclaimed any idea of a Protectorate of Egypt; but do not these two transactions look something very like a financial Protectorate over Egypt? The House will, I think, await with some curiosity the explanation of the Government as to its financial dealings with the Khedive. The investment of £2,000,000 in a loan to the Khedive is either an investment that was made on exceedingly bad security, or else, if we are going to undertake to put the finances of the Khedive on a satisfactory footing, we are embarking in a very large and very hazardous enterprise. When the Papers are laid on the Table, I hope they will furnish the fullest information as to the instructions which the Government gave to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Shoreham; for I cannot help thinking that the Government of this country is placed in a somewhat unenviable position by what has taken place since the mission of the right hon. Gentleman began. It cannot be satisfactory to the Government, certainly it is not satisfactory to hon. Members of this House, to know that every Stock Exchange in Europe has been agitated from day to day by reports of the proceedings of the Envoy of our Government; that one day it should be reported that the Envoy is coming home, having quarrelled with the Khedive, and that stocks should consequently fall, whilst on the next day it should be reported that the Envoy is on good terms with the Khedive, and that the stocks should immediately rise. I trust the Government will clearly explain to the country and to Europe what is the nature of the mission with which the right hon. Gentleman has been charged, and what course the Government intend to pursue in regard to Egypt. I believe the Government will admit that there is a great deal to explain, and on them rests the burden of proving that the action they have taken was necessary for the security of the Empire. They will not deny, I think, that such transactions as the present are of a delicate nature, and only to be entered into from high political and national considerations. Conducted even without the machinery of the Stock Exchange, they would be of doubtful policy. Our Government is not adapted to interfere in the management of great industrial enterprises of this kind; their interference in such matters would rather check than encourage private enterprise and energy. We know, however, that such transactions as this cannot be conducted without the assistance of the machinery of the Stock Exchange, and of course suspicion is easily awakened as to the character of the operation. Even in the present instance large dealings are spoken of, and reports are current of large fortunes being made. Probably there is no other country in Europe where such a transaction as this would have been effected without the character of the public men negotiating it being suspected. In our case, thank Heaven, no such suspicion can be whispered; but I believe that if such transactions as this should ever unfortunately become the rule, not even the character of English statesmen would escape being called in question. I think the Government, in this matter, have much to explain; but, at the same time, I have not desired in connection with it to speak in any Party sense. If I have appeared to criticize in a hostile spirit the transaction which the Government has entered into, it is because I have deemed it the best way to elicit the information which the House and the country desire. The Government, I think, will be glad to seize this opportunity of removing the misconceptions and exaggerations which have prevailed on the subject, and of laying before the country at this late hour a frank and sincere explanation of the policy which they have pursued. I feel that I have now detained the House long enough, and I will simply thank them for the patience with which they have listened to me.

MR. DISRAELI: There is one point on which I am most happy to agree with the noble Lord who has just addressed the House, and that is in his appreciation of the ability with which the Address was moved and seconded this evening. We are always gratified at a display of ability on either side of the House, for it is to the interest of all of us to sustain its reputation; and I am not using what some might suppose to be the conventional language of Parliament when I say that I have seldom seen the difficult and delicate task of moving and seconding the Address fulfilled more ably, or, so to speak, in a better House-of-Commons spirit than to-night. I am sure my hon. Friends must be gratified by the reception they experienced on both sides of the House, and by the courteous recognition of their ability by the noble Lord.

Having touched on this matter the noble Lord proceeded critically to analyze the contents of the gracious Speech from the Throne, and he took a course which, I think, on the whole was convenient, and was, in some degree, an example of his rhetorical skill, by passing to some points which, though mentioned in the Gracious Speech, are not at this moment of the extreme interest of those which occupy the earlier portion of it. From what I gathered the noble Lord seemed to approve the intended legislation. He seemed to think the subjects deserved the attention of Parliament; but he regretted that more details were not given of the character of the Bills about to be introduced. When the Bills are brought forward, however, I think the noble Lord will obtain, in the usual Parliamentary manner, those details which he requires.

The noble Lord seemed to treat as a mere idle phrase in the Speech from the Throne that there were other important subjects to which, if opportunity is permitted us during the Session, we shall also, besides those noticed, call the attention of Parliament. I can assure the noble Lord that that was not an idle phrase; but it appeared to us that we had of late years—both parties—rather got into the habit of giving a catalogue of measures, excellent in themselves, and which, no doubt, both sides sincerely wished to carry, but which experience had shown it was impossible to carry; and then Government was taunted at the end of the Session with their list of abortive measures, whilst those measures which they had passed—measures, perhaps, of much importance and utility—were forgotten in the reprobation excited against them by not completing the catalogue which they had announced. We have other important measures that are not specified in Her Majesty's Speech. They are quite ready; and if it is any satisfaction to the noble Lord, I may say there is a measure to prevent the pollution of rivers.

The noble Lord next proceeded to the Colonies, and touched on a subject which at this moment engages the feelings of the people of this country—namely, slavery. For my part, I do not pretend that this side of the House is more zealous than the other in its attempts to discourage and abolish slavery. It is a national policy. It is a policy accepted, and must be accepted, by all who attempt to carry on the business of this country. Each Party and every Government is influenced by the same motives, always working for the same end in this matter. I might appeal with confidence to the fact that the present Government have made strong efforts not only to discourage, but to abolish slavery, under circumstances in which it was previously thought impossible we could interfere.

Originally the British Government terminated slavery within its own dominions; then the great passion of the people assumed another phase—it would not be satisfied until it had entirely abolished the slave trade; and I may say these two great objects have been virtually accomplished. But this country has always hesitated to attempt to interfere with what for convenience is called domestic slavery in other countries—firstly, because of our inability to deal with the evil; and, secondly, from the consciousness that our limited interference had a necessary tendency to aggravate the evil. But it did so happen that after the settlement of the war on the West Coast of Africa, Lord Carnarvon—than whom no Colonial Minister can be animated by a more powerful desire to sustain an anti-slavery policy—had an opportunity of which he availed himself, though it was considered a dangerous experiment, absolutely to terminate domestic slavery throughout the whole of that extensive region known as the protected districts of West Africa. I am not attempting to arrogate to ourselves any peculiar claim on the confidence of the House on this head. We are perfectly willing to admit that our predecessors—as I am sure our successors also, whoever they may be—would act exactly as we have acted. Still, I think I am justified in reminding the House of our conduct on the occasion I have referred to.

The noble Lord touched upon the two Circulars which have so much attracted the attention of the country. Now, with regard to that matter, I am perfectly ready to admit that the Government are responsible for the first Circular. I am myself responsible for it, although I did not see it. I hope I am not in the loose habit of fathering mistakes on some anonymous, obscure member of the Administration—probably a permanent clerk—and saying he is the guilty person—nothing of the kind. The Circular was issued under the usual circumstances, which ought to have insured, no doubt, a different result. The Government are responsible for it, though I am not here to defend it for a moment. But the country condoned the error—they were satisfied when it was recalled, and I need not dwell upon it further. To my mind the second Circular is a much more fit subject for our consideration. For that

Circular the Government is responsible. The second Circular was prepared by the Cabinet, under the direct influence of the Lord Chancellor; and, in our judgment, it is an accurate declaration of the law so far as it is possible to express the instructions which have to be laid down for the guidance of those who have to carry them out. Then the noble Lord says—"What is the necessity of any Circular at all?" Why, the necessity of Circulars is this—that our officers on foreign stations found themselves every now and then committing acts in the most innocent-minded manner which ended in actions being brought against them, damages being incurred, and compensation being paid by this country for them. Therefore, it is easy to understand why they should appeal for instructions. But, then, I am told, and we have been told to-night by persons sitting in this House of very great authority—we have been told that, and we have heard it every day for the last two or three months in the country—Why did you let your instructions be known?—why not have secret instructions? Now, I cannot agree with that suggestion. I think that great embarrassments, that great evils have arisen in this case from their being secret instructions, and there is nothing that I would more disapprove than of secret instructions for a regular and continuous conduct. It is intelligible that in a diplomatic arrangement, where you have to gain some particular point in a temporary and transient matter, you may find it necessary to give your negotiator secret instructions; but that you should have secret instructions for the fulfilment of a permanent duty, and that by officers of Her Majesty's ships, appears to me to be a most impolitic and unwise thing. I do not agree that we should not have made our instructions public in the last instance. I think they ought to have been made public from the first, and at all times, in order that the criticism of the country and public opinion might operate upon them, and I cannot doubt that the effect of this mutual assistance between the country and the officers would be highly beneficial to the latter in the fulfilment of their duties. Well, then, the noble Lord says—"But what is the use of issuing a Commission?"—a Commission which is to inquire into Treaties, into the stipulations of Treaties which are all to be found, no doubt, in the archives of the Foreign Office, and upon which your Law Officers ought to be able to give a definite opinion. But the Commission to which the noble Lord refers is not to look only into the stipulations of Treaties; but it is to look also into the state of public law, and see whether it is possible or necessary to alter that law which would require negotiations with foreign countries. It is not, then, a mere reference to the stipulations of Treaties, it is to consider the public law upon this subject—to see whether it is advisable that it should be altered, and how, by negotiation, those alterations can be effected. There is another reason for the inquiry besides these technical reasons which I think sufficient. The feeling of this country always will be on this question more or less deep, and it must be a satisfaction to the country to know that there should be a full and free and open inquiry into the subject by those most competent to form an opinion upon the matter; and therefore I cannot take that view of the case which the noble Lord does. I believe the proposition which Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to recommend to the notice of Parliament is a wise and will be a salutary arrangement. The noble Lord, having touched upon these topics with less fulness, he then proceeded to the great points of his speech.

First of all he called our attention to that part of Her Majesty's Speech in which She has informed the House that She has agreed to support the Austrian Note, which seeks to induce the Porte to carry out certain suggestions which it submits with the view of terminating the insurrection that exists in the provinces of Herzegovina and Bosnia. The noble Lord, although seeming to shrink on the present occasion from any objection to the course we have taken, expressed a fear that our intervention may have passed the line which we ought to have pursued. I do not think Her Majesty's Government acted differently from the course they should have taken in the case of the Austrian proposition. The Austrian proposition, as the House knows, is a public paper which contains a great many suggestions of changes in the administration of the Turkish Provinces in question, and many fresh proposals which, if adopted, no doubt would be favourable to the Christian subjects of the Porte. Suppose, for example, we had refused to recommend the Porte to give a favourable consideration of the Austrian Note. We should have placed ourselves in a position of isolation. As a general rule, I must say that that is not a position in public affairs which it is desirable for this country to take. Generally speaking, if you place yourself in a position of isolation and do not act with the other Powers, you may certainly in some cases avoid the imputation of having combined to bring about a result which in some degree you may not entirely approve; but you deprive yourself of the means and opportunity even in a business of which you greatly disapprove of mitigating much which you cannot sanction, and of preventing much which you would not adopt. In this case it was not our opinion that it was one in which we ought to hold aloof. But suppose we had taken another course. Suppose we had refused to sanction the Austrian Note. What would have been the consequence? The consequence would have been that the Sultan probably would have rejected it. The House must feel that this country would incur a great responsibility by taking a course which she could not sustain. It would not do to counsel the Sultan to reject the Austrian Note, and then, when he found himself opposed to all the Powers of Europe, shrink away and say—"We gave you that advice, but we are not prepared to support you in acting upon it." Would it have been prudent to support the Sultan under such circumstances in choosing the question of the government of a small province like Herzegovina as the occasion, perhaps, of deciding the fate of the Turkish Empire? I think that that course was not one which could have been pursued with any advantage. Now there was a third course proposed by eminent persons, and no doubt received the sanction of men whose judgment upon such matters is not to be despised, and that was a proposal for a Conference in the matter. Had we proposed a Conference upon the state of the insurrectionary provinces of Turkey the other Powers would scarcely have agreed to the Conference. In all probability the other Powers, who had their scheme and matured it after great sacrifices and difficulty, would not have accepted our proposal. But if we had succeeded in having a Conference—what could we have done at the Conference? We could only propose the very suggestions which are made in the Austrian Note, or some somewhat identical. There are subjects which we believe can be touched, and yet the independence of the Porte be respected, and subjects of that kind, perhaps identical ones, would, after all, had there been a Conference upon our advice, probably alone have been brought forward. Then I come to this—that, under these circumstances, there was no other course for England to take but calmly and gravely to consider whether it was not better and necessary—absolutely inevitable—to support the Austrian Note and advise the Porte to accept it. But before we did that we considered our course carefully. We did not act precipitately. We did not agree to the step without hesitation—prudent and proper hesitation. We did not suddenly change our mind and agree to the course of policy which we have approved. We received assurances from Russia and from Austria which to me are satisfactory, because, I am not ashamed to say, I believe they are sincere. And if what I have said were not sufficient to make the House approve of what we have done, I think, they will agree with us when I mention the last incident in this matter. Before we agreed to support the Austrian Note, it had been intimated to us, in the most unmistakable manner, that it was the desire of the Porte, however much it might be opposed to receive such a Note, that if such a Note were presented, England should not stand aloof. I hope, therefore, the noble Lord will not feel that there is any foundation for the fears he entertains—that we have embarked rashly on an intervention to which there could be no limit. So far as England is concerned, she is as free and as independent to act in this matter—if this attempt at a settlement of the Provinces should fail—as she ever was; and she will act in the manner which becomes those—as far as her present Administration is concerned—who wish to maintain the Empire of England, its independence, and its freedom in all those quarters which are affected by this great controversy.

I now come to the question of the Suez Canal. The noble Lord found a good foundation for his speech in our conduct in reference to the Suez Canal. The noble Lord's speech on the Suez Canal was of a peculiar kind, and it appeared to have affected the whole of his argument. Virtually he said this—"Did you embark in this speculation for the reason alleged by Lord Derby?"—and the noble Lord quoted words attributed to Lord Derby. Lord Derby has, in other places, alleged other reasons. I suppose the House is not surprised that there are more reasons than one. "Did you embark in this speculation for the reason alleged by Lord Derby at Edinburgh, or did you do it on account of the Eastern Question?" Well, first of all, I should like to know what the noble Lord means by the Eastern Question; and I should like to know what Member of the Government has ever used the words "Eastern Question" with regard to the Suez Canal? Why, Sir, the relations between the British Government and the Suez Canal are not relations of yesterday. This is not a subject kept in obscurity by Her Majesty's Government, or by the Government that has preceded us, who had also some experience of the Suez Canal and the nature and value of its property. The interest we felt in the Suez Canal had many ramifications. When we acceded to office two years ago, an International Commission had only just ceased its labours at Constantinople upon the dues of the Suez Canal, and upon the means of ascertaining and maintaining a limit of them, and it had arrived at reasons entirely protested against by the Proprietary. What was the state of affairs there? Lord Derby had to deal with them. The proprietor of the Canal threatened, and not only threatened but proceeded, to stop the Canal. They refused pilots; they threatened to change the signals; they took steps which would have intercepted that mode of intercourse with India. Well, what course did the English take? We appealed to the Suzerain—then more powerful on such questions than at present. But it was with extreme difficulty—it was only by exerting our influence at Constantinople, and also at Cairo, by the influence, not only of the Suzerain but of the Khedive himself, that the mischief was prevented. And how was it prevented? Why, affairs had got to such a point that a force of 10,000 men was ordered to the scene of action; and it was only at the last moment that the proprietary of the Canal gave up its hostile operations, but under protest—protest still continually renewed—calling upon the Porte, as Suzerain, to re-imburse and compensate them for the losses which they had experienced by adopting the tariff forced upon them. From that moment it became a matter of interest to those responsible for the government of this country to see what could be done to remedy those relations with the Suez Canal. It was a matter of immense difficulty, but still it was not neglected by the Government; for during that period, on more than one occasion, M. Lesseps came over here himself, and entered into communication with us as he had before with our Predecessors, but there was no possible means of coming to any settlement which would be satisfactory to the proprietary. Now what was the peculiar influence—a very transitory influence, but still an influence—by which we managed to bring about a tolerable state of affairs? Why, it was the influence of the Suzerain and the Khedive—principally, of course, of the Khedive. We found him—as Governments of England have generally found him—a faithful ally; one disposed favourably to consider every fair claim of this country. It was the influence of the Khedive, who was proprietor of a moiety, certainly of two-fifths of the shares, that counteracted the dissatisfied spirit of the proprietary. But it suddenly comes to our knowledge that the Khedive, on whose influence we mainly depended, is going to part with his shares. We received a telegram from Cairo informing us that the Khedive was anxious to raise a considerable sum of money upon his shares in the Suez Canal, and offered them to England. We considered the question immediately, and it appeared to us to be a complicated transaction—one to which there were several objections; and we sent back to say that we were favourably disposed to assist the Khedive, but that, at the same time, we were only prepared to purchase the shares outright. What was the answer? The answer was that the Khedive was resolved, if he possibly could, to keep his shares, and that he could only, therefore, avail himself of a loan. There matters seemed to end,

Mr. Disraeli

Then, suddenly, there came news to the Government of this country that a French Society—the Société Générale—was prepared to offer to the Khedive a large sum of money—very little inferior to the £4,000,000—but on very onerous conditions. The Khedive communicated with us, and said the conditions were so severe that he would sooner sell the shares outright and—which I had forgotten to mention—that, in deference to his promise that England should always have the refusal of the shares if he decided to sell them, he offered them to the English Government. It was absolutely necessary to decide at that moment what course we should take. It was not a thing on which we could hesitate. We knew, on the 20th of November, that there was a French Society who was prepared—I say nothing about the terms—[An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!]
—I say nothing about the terms, but they were severer than ours—to give the Khedive nearly £4,000,000 for his shares. Now, I must call the attention of the House to a remarkable diplomatic scene. The Papers will, no doubt, be laid on the Table of the House; but I quote from the French despatches in the Yellow Book placed upon the Table of the French Assembly. On the 20th of November it was believed in France that this French Society to which I have referred had succeeded, and had got the Khedive's shares, and the French Minister—not Ambassador, who was absent, but a gentleman we know and respect highly—M. Gavard—was absolutely instructed to call upon Lord Derby—I do not say for the purpose of pumping him—but to sound him whether England would tolerate the purchase of those shares by the French Society in question; and Lord Derby spoke with the utmost frankness on the subject. He said it was a very grave point; that he did not think England would view with favour the whole of the Khedive's shares passing to the French Company; that while we accorded to M. Lesseps the glory of this great work, and did not want the shares ourselves, we should be very glad if the Khedive retained his shares, and that things had gone on quietly, as we should have trusted to his just management. But, said Lord Derby, if you come to us for our opinion as to what the feelings of England would be in respect to the purchase of all those shares by France, I will frankly tell you that she would consider such a result as a calamity, and I certainly could not look with approval upon the accomplishment of such an arrangement. Well, on the 27th of November, the French Ambassador, the Marquis d'Harcourt, returned to England and called on Lord Derby upon the same subject—the Suez Canal shares of the Khedive; and it was to ask an explanation why England had bought them, and what was the intention of England in so doing. Therefore, within those seven days—between the 20th and 27th—all those various phases had occurred in the transaction, and during that period, having only had 48 hours, we did arrive at our decision. Lord Derby told the French Ambassador why we had decided. He said we should have been very well pleased if the thing had remained as it was; but that England could not see with satisfaction all those shares in the hands of one Company, and that, therefore, we had taken the step he came to inquire about. To pretend that Lord Derby has treated this business as a mere commercial speculation, as has been stated by an hon. Member of this House, is idle. If he did not act in accordance with the principles of high policy, I should like to know what high policy is, and how a man can pursue it. Apart from looking upon this as an investment, if the shares had been offered, and if there had been no arrangement of paying interest for 19 years, so far as I am concerned, I should have been in favour of the purchase of the shares. I should have agreed with Lord Derby in thinking that England would never be satisfied if all the shares of the Suez Canal were possessed by a foreign Company. Then it is said, if any obstacles had been put in your way by the French proprietors of the Canal, you know very well that ultimately it must come to force, and you will then obtain at once the satisfaction you desire. Well, if the government of the world was a mere alternation between abstract right and overwhelming force, I agree there is a good deal in that observation; but that is not the way in which the world is governed. The world is governed by conciliation, compromise, influence, varied interests, the recognition of the rights of others, coupled with the assertion of one's own; and in addition a general conviction, resulting from explanation and good understanding, that it is for the interest of all parties that matters should be conducted in a satisfactory and peaceful manner. Therefore I say that even if the arrangement had been such as the noble Lord assumes, and we had had but very little power in the representation and management of the Canal—even if that had been the case, I cannot doubt that the moral influence of England, possessing two-fifths of the shares in this great undertaking, must have made itself felt, must have had a considerable influence upon the conduct of those who managed the Company, and must have resulted in arrangements tending to mutual and general advantage. The noble Lord has sneered at our having only a few votes in a meeting of shareholders; but I think that one effect of the mission of Mr. Cave and Colonel Stokes will be to bring about a different result. It is not convenient at this moment—the House will understand when the negotiation is not absolutely finished that it is not convenient to enter into particulars; but I am justified in saying that, as far as one can form a judgment, there is every prospect of English interests being amply and adequately represented in the management of the Company. Then the noble Lord finds fault with us for not resorting to the advice of Parliament after we had completed the provisional transaction. He says—"This is a case of unprecedented expenditure, and you ought to have appealed immediately to Parliament." I would remind the noble Lord that it is not a case of unprecedented expenditure, because not a shilling has yet been expended. When the Bank Act was suspended Parliament was instantly summoned, because when the Bank proposed to pay for gold with paper the nation became much alarmed, and desired that the causes for such a course should be inquired into, in order that, if necessary, a Parliamentary indemnity should be given. There is no violation of the law in what has taken place. It is very much like a complaint I heard the other day, that we ought to have gone to the Bank of England, and not to the house of Rothschild, in reference to this purchase. The Bank of England would no more have advanced £4,000,000 for the purchase of these shares, and taken the responsibility of holding them upon themselves, than they would have paid off the National Debt. The Bank of England would have been ready, I dare say, if it were legal, to advance £4,000,000 to the Government. But the house of Rothschild did not merely advance £4,000,000. We said—"Will you purchase these shares on our engagement that we will ask the House of Commons to take them off your hands?" They did so. That was a great risk, and I believe they would not have undertaken it if they had not felt that it was of great consequence to the country that they should do so. It would be a rare and unexpected and unparalleled thing for the Bank of England, or any other bank, to undertake such a responsibility. Well, now, the noble Lord says he wants to know how this Canal purchase is to be an additional security for our route to India—is it in time of peace or in time of war that it is to be an additional security? Well, I have no hesitation in saying in time of peace, and I think I have shown him that our possessing this great interest in this undertaking, that our possessing this power and consequence, is an additional security to us—a security in times of peace. When the noble Lord asks me, Is it an additional security in time of war? I would say that I must refrain from entering into speculations of what England will do in time of war, or what will be the circumstances in the Mediterranean or the Levant in times of war. We are contemplating this purchase in reference to a time of peace, and we may form such conclusions as we like as to what might be its worth in a time of war. And in times of peace no one can doubt the advantage of this purchase, when you remember when we had not a share how we were then menaced with the shutting of the Canal. We know how there are a thousand ways, without authorizing the use of preponderating force, to assert our rights; there are a thousand ways of obstructing the navigation of the Canal, and if the interest we have obtained is merely for times of peace, it is a most important result. As for the assertion that in this affair the whole of what the noble Lord calls the "Eastern Question" is concerned, I have nothing to do with it. I have nothing more to do with that than with the idle observations that we hear every now and then on the course we have pursued—that we have changed our Eastern policy, and that we have substituted another policy for that which is the ancient policy of England. I utterly deny that. The policy of England in that part of the world is much more simple than would be suspected from the cloudy descriptions of it which one sometimes encounters. England is a Mediterranean Power; a great Mediterranean Power. This is shown by the fact that in time of war always, and frequently in time of peace, she has the greatest force upon those waters. Furthermore she has strongholds upon those waters which she will never relinquish. The policy of England, however, is not one of aggression. It is not Provinces she wants. She will not interest herself in the re-distribution of territory on the shores of the Mediterranean as long as that re-distribution does not imperil the freedom of the seas and the dominion which she legitimately exercises. And therefore I look upon this, that in the great chain of fortresses which we possess, almost from the metropolis to India, that the Suez Canal is a means of securing the free intercourse of the waters—is a great addition to that security, and one we should prize. Now, I think I have touched upon most of the subjects, except one, which the noble Lord treated upon, and that is the analysis of the price which the shares really ought to have commanded. I will not enter upon that subject at present, because on Monday next we shall have an opportunity of going, if necessary, and if desired by the House, into the most minute details of figures. All I will now say is, that I entirely protest against, and shall be prepared to show that there is no foundation for, the statement of the noble Lord. The fact is, that though we gave £4,000,000 for the shares, there were other £4,000,000 in a hostile quarter ready to be paid for the same shares. Therefore, it is not likely that there would be two competitors who were offering the same sum, if, as the noble Lord has so satisfactorily proved, we ought to have got the shares for half the sum we have given for them. But there will be a better opportunity on Monday for the noble Lord and his Friends to go into the subject in detail than would be fitting upon the present occasion, when all discussion upon it must necessarily be desultory; although I trust I have met most of the objections of the noble Lord as far as they go. On Monday next we shall again go into this question, when it may be sifted and it may be examined by men of different orders and tones of mind. Some may take an economical view of the subject, some may take a commercial view, some may take a peaceful view, some may take a warlike view of it; but of this I feel persuaded—and I speak with confidence—that when I appeal to the House of Commons for their vote they will agree with the country, that this was a purchase which was necessary to maintain the Empire, and which favours in every degree the policy which this country ought to sustain.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the House, Sir, will be good enough to favour me with its attention for a short time, I will at once seek to relieve hon. Members from the apprehension which will, perhaps, be uppermost in the minds of many, that what I am about to say at this peculiar hour will lead to a prolonged debate. I intend to confine my remarks to one or two points which will excite no controversy whatever between the two sides of the House, although they relate to the very important subject of what is termed "the Eastern Question," in respect of which I desire to discharge myself of what I feel is a peculiar responsibility cast upon me. I shall therefore make no reference whatever to the many interesting topics which have been dealt with by my noble Friend and by the right hon. Gentleman, because I think with them that other opportunities are at hand when we shall be in a position to deal with them to a greater advantage than we could at the present moment. In referring to the Eastern Question, apart from the subject of the Suez Canal, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be under the impression that the noble Marquess in his speech, not, perhaps, in the way of direct assertion, but of apprehension and doubt, had suggested something like a censure upon the conduct pursued by Her Majesty's Government in giving their adhesion to the Austrian Note. Now, Sir, for myself I have no authority, nor do I assume any, to explain the speech of the noble Marquess, but, speaking as one of the auditors of that speech, I must say that I am at a loss to conceive in what part of it, or in what words, the right hon. Gentleman discovered any such disposition on the part of the noble Marquess to question or censure this portion of the Government's policy. The noble Marquess, with that prudence and wisdom which marked the whole tenour of his speech, endeavoured to warn hon. Members and the public against expecting very speedy results from any intervention that might be attempted. In the wisdom of that warning we are all disposed to concur; but, if I rightly understood the noble Marquess he expressed his unhesitating approval of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in giving their adhesion to the Austrian Note, so far as we are acquainted with the particulars—and we are of course very imperfectly acquainted with them. But I wish to say a word or two on this special question. If, indeed, any doubt or misgiving existed in the minds of any one as to the propriety of this proceeding on the part of Her Majesty's Government, I think that the reasons which the right hon. Gentleman has given for the course they have taken, would sufficiently justify their conduct in the matter. I, however, hope that in giving the reasons he has done for the acts of the Government the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to convey the idea that there are no other and broader and deeper motives for the step they have taken than those he has assigned. At any rate, I wish to explain to the House very clearly what I conceive to be morally and historically the position of this question as it concerns this country and its relations with the Turkish Empire. To do this satisfactorily I must revert to the period of the Crimean War, and perhaps the House will excuse me for making the reference, for I am, indeed, the only man in this House who was responsible as a Minister for leading the country into that war, and therefore I may be supposed to be in some degree cognizant of the views which led us to take that step, with regard to which there has been much diversity of opinion and much misrepresentation. What was generally understood to be the purpose of the Crimean War, was expressed in the phrase that we sought to maintain the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire. That was a phrase which was a favourite with the public at that time. It implied that we were to make very vigorous efforts to repress the designs and attempts by the Russian Empire which appeared to be dangerous to the peace of Europe. Some persons thought that England had a separate interest in that war independent of that of Europe, but that was an idea that I never entertained. But in upholding the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire I will venture to say for myself and the Government of that day that they entertained the strongest opinion as to the conditions which were requisite for that integrity and that independence. I am not going to refer to anything so slight and trivial and so likely to be misleading as individual recollections, but I point to facts which amount to demonstration of the proposition. References have been made to-night to the opinion of Lord Palmerston that he was most anxious to maintain the independence and integrity of Turkey. Lord Palmerston, there can be no doubt, was sanguine beyond most men in his belief that these would be maintained. He had a freshness and almost youthfulness of faith on the subject, which no one could regard without interest, especially when his long and distinguished life was approaching its close. But Lord Palmerston knew on all occasions that a vital and essential condition of that state of things was the redress of grievances within the Turkish Empire; that it was totally impossible in the face of Christian Europe that the state of things prevailing at that period between the Mahomedan Power and the subject Christian population, especially the Europeans, could be persisted in, and the people of these countries, anxious as they were to stop Russian aggression, never would have entered on that war unless they had received what they thought conclusive and sufficient guarantees that these grievances would be redressed. This was not a mere matter of individual opinion, and so strong was this feeling in Europe that in the very heat of the crisis the Sultan, by a most solemn instrument, was compelled to pledge himself, as far as the constitutions of the country would permit him, to redress those grievances, and to place them upon a religious—of course, I do not say a political—equality with the rest of his subjects. That instrument was one of the great and fundamental facts of the time of the Crimean War, and my proposition is this—that, after the Crimean War, after that effusion of life and treasure, after Europe had been involved in the struggle, and its whole existence, as it were, suspended upon it for those years, and after it was made known to Turkey that it was absolutely necessary, in view of those who supported her, that stringent and effectual provision should be made for the redress of those grievances, it is doubly impossible after those facts have been placed on record, that the Government of this country could fold its arms and say that the relations of the Turkish Ruler and his Christian subjects are to us matters of no concern. We cannot now turn round and say—"We have no right to expect anything from the Sultan, and the Christian population of Turkey has no right to expect anything at our hands." I am most grateful, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government, instead of being actuated by that principle—a principle totally inconsistent with the facts of history and with the most obvious and most elementary obligations of national duty—have given in their adhesion to the Austrian Note. I do not enter fully into this question at the present moment, because I do not feel myself prepared to do so; but all I can say is, that I am most thankful that the Government have not taken a course of abstention upon this important occasion. When we know the terms of Count Andrassy's Note, it will be our duty to consider them, and all further steps that are taken in this matter will be subject to the control and the government of this House. But at the present moment, recollecting as I do that there were many apparently friendly counsellors of the Government, at the period when they had this matter under deliberation, who were warning them—in the Press—to do nothing at all; I for my part congratulate and express my acknowledgments to the Government for declining to be inveigled and misled by those unwise counsellors. I will not now enter into the question whether the promises of the Ottoman Government with regard to its Christian subjects have or have not been shamelessly broken. This I must say—the Ottoman Government has been well represented to us in many of its personal Representatives. It has had Ministers of great ability within our memory; but, unfortunately, most of those men, whose energies and talents induced Lord Palmerston to entertain such sanguine expectations with regard to Turkey, have been removed by early death. In this country for nearly 30 years, I think, if not more, we have had the advantage of seeing the Porte represented at the Court of our Sovereign by a Minister who enjoys the respect and regard of all who have the pleasure of his acquaintance. When the Sultan of that extended Empire visited this country, the impression which his personal demeanour produced upon those who were brought into contact with him was an impression of the most satisfactory description. I think I am bound to say, in justice to the Ottoman Government, that I believe that the resolutions which were announced at Constantinople at the time when that Government promised internal reforms were sincerely made. But the difficulty of the case of Turkey is this—it has not, as a general rule, or it has only to a very scanty degree, a class of men of power, influence, education, and station, without whom it is impossible to give effect to the decisions of the Government. In certain cases, no doubt, improvements were effected shortly after the Crimean War, in accordance with the provisions of the Firman or Hatihumayoun which had been issued by the Sultan. It will be for the Government, when the time has arrived, to give us full information of the particulars of the recent intervention, and to give us such information as may enable us to judge whether the promises that were so solemnly made have been kept, and whether we have reason to hope that if those promises are now renewed, they will be more effectually kept in future. But I fear that a want of executive power will defeat the best intentions of the Government of Turkey. This proposition, for my own part, I maintain, that if promises such as these so solemnly given have really failed in their fulfilment, it is not possible to go on with a mere repetition of promises. Europe, the Christian conscience, and the conscience of mankind will expect some other sort of security for the redress of great and dreadful grievances than mere words can afford; and however desirous we may be to maintain the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire, that integrity and independence can never be effectually maintained unless it can be proved to the world—and proved not by words, but by acts—that the Government of Turkey has the power to administer a fair measure of justice to

on the part of the noble Marquess to question or censure this portion of the Government's policy. The noble Marquess, with that prudence and wisdom which marked the whole tenour of his speech, endeavoured to warn hon. Members and the public against expecting very speedy results from any intervention that might be attempted. all its subjects alike, whether Christian or Mahomedan. Believing myself that this is a subject on which we have no difference of opinion according to our political separation, and that at the same time it is a subject of great importance, I was very desirous to make these brief explanations, and I thank the House for the kindness with which it has listened to them.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, that if it had not been for the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Gladstone), he should not have thought fit to present himself to the attention of the House; but the right hon. Gentleman had, under the cloak of approving a particular act of the Government, recommended a policy which was not the policy of the Government, and which he was happy to say was directly contrary to the spirit of the policy of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that by the insertion into the Treaty of Paris of the promise of reforms made by the Sultan on that occasion, European Powers had acquired the right—a moral right at any rate—to see those reforms properly carried out. He would ask whether that was a right which only dated from to-day, and whether, during all the many years that the right hon. Gentleman was at the head of affairs, he had once remonstrated in a friendly way with the Porte relative to the condition of the country, when those remonstrances might have been effective and could not be interpreted as hostile acts? Then, again, the right hon. Gentleman went back to the year 1856, at the close of the Crimean War. He (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) would ask to be allowed to go back to that year too, and to say that all the troubles and difficulties in which Turkey was at the present time involved were owing to what occurred at that epoch. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to Turkey as a despotic form of government. Well, previous to that year Turkey was the least despotically-governed country in the world. It was a government essentially of checks and counter-checks: the Pasha elected by the Divan, the Cadi by the chief of the Law, the local administration of the Provinces, all independent of each other, and at Constantinople no Imperial measure decided on without due deliberation by a Divan. In 1856, as a result of the Crimean War, the influence of European nations—of the Western nations—became predominant, and, under cover of this predominance, Ali Pasha introduced a revolution in the government of Turkey, from which it has ever since been suffering—namely, from being a constitutional government, he converted it into a despotism by the abolition of the constitutional Divan. What were the cardinal vices of the Turkish Empire at the present day? The first great grievance in Turkey was the mal-administration of the Provinces, which arose principally from the fact that the Pashas were changed at the mere will of the Sovereign. The under-officials, when the eye over them was being constantly changed, became corrupt; but, in former times, the Sultan had no power to change the Governors of Provinces without consultation with his Divan. Another source of corruption was that Firmans and decrees were continually being passed by the Sultan and were not yet obeyed in the Provinces. Thirdly, there was the financial condition arising from its Debt. Now, each one of these vices arose from the pernicious change introduced when the Divan was abolished and the Government of Turkey revolutionized into a despotism. These Firmans and decrees had no binding force in Turkey, because no arbitrary decrees could by the Constitution of Turkey—which was centuries old and had never been legally abolished—be issued; and if you wished to see these decrees and Firmans enforced and carried out, you must try to bring about the revival of the old Turkish Constitution. If your efforts were devoted to this end, you might effect a great and beneficial reform in the Turkish Empire which mere adhesion to the Austrian Note could never effect. If the Government thought that the reception of the Andrassy Note was the conclusion of the Eastern difficulty, he could only congratulate them upon their simplicity. He trusted that the Government would preserve absolute freedom of action, so that in time to come their policy might not be fettered. Anybody who expected that the Ottoman Empire had no sources of vitality in it would be entirely disappointed. As to the Suez Canal purchase, he did not remember such another unanimous verdict of approval in this country as had ratified that transaction, therefore it was not worth while to defend it. He would only venture this criticism, that the new order of things which had been introduced by this purchase seemed to recognize the importance to us of the marine highway to India; but this highway could not be of much importance unless England was absolute mistress of the seas. She could not be this until she had annulled the Declaration of Paris, to which, in a fatal moment, she put her hand. The purchase of the Canal shares to him seemed to imply the annulling the Declaration of Paris.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I am one of those hon. Members who survived the horrors of the middle passage in the rush to the House of Lords this afternoon. I went into that Assembly in the hope of hearing something that would be satisfactory to that portion of the United Kingdom which my hon. Friends around me, and myself, as well as some of those on the other side of the House, represent. I confess that during that passage I thought that if the time comes, as I think it will come, when perhaps even Her gracious Majesty herself will open Parliament in another place, her retinue will be able to manage the ceremonial somewhat more respectfully so far as the Commons are concerned. I do not know if I should to-night have ventured to intrude upon the House of Commons, if it had not been for the observations which fell from the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) who seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, who expressed his satisfaction at a circumstance which, I feel certain, will produce an exactly opposite feeling across the Channel. The people of Ireland will not feel satisfaction at the statement that the condition of the country is a matter of absolute indifference to Her Majesty. The hon. Gentleman to whose speech I refer stated that Ireland was tranquil, that Ireland was prosperous, and he very justly said that the Irish people were thankful to Providence for the excellent harvest with which they were blest last year. The Irish people have, indeed, reason to be thankful to Providence, for it is little they get from man. When, however, he told us that there was satisfaction, prosperity, and tranquillity in the country, he might have remembered that at this present moment—the House of Commons may feel proud under the circumstances—that there are, I believe, now—within the last three weeks—six counties in Ireland enjoying the ordinary rights of British subjects. The rest of Ireland is under the galling code of coercion, which is the heritage of the last Session. Finding, as the Irish Members have, that the interests of their country are not sufficient to occupy the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and being desirous of showing their fellow-subjects in England that the statement that Ireland is governed by the same laws as this country is not the fact, they have decided to introduce Bills which will give this House an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion whether or not the statement that Ireland lives under English law is true or false. It is perfectly untrue that Ireland is governed by the same laws as England. The Parliamentary franchise, the municipal franchise, and the municipal privileges of Ireland are quite different from those of England. We have been so fortunate as to obtain in the Ballot such a position as will enable us soon to bring some of these matters before the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman, whom I am proud to follow, will submit to the House a subject which might have been thought well worthy of an intellectual Cabinet—a measure for improving higher education in Ireland. He will also introduce a Bill designed to amend some glaring and patent defects in the law relating to the tenure of land in that country. The other Bills which will be introduced will, at all events, show that there is on the part of the Irish people a determination that no stone shall be left unturned to show to the Houses of Parliament that they desire to be judged fairly. If their legislation is neglected they will, as far as they can, and as long as they are obliged to come to this House for their local legislation, endeavour to repair the errors which I think will be shown to exist, and which might have met with some attention on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I can only say that they will give the House of Commons an opportunity of learning what it is that Ireland demands. There will be no shrinking from any debate on the subject of the demand of Ireland for the restoration of her national Parliament and for the modification of the powers of that Parliament. Although I will not touch on the subject of foreign policy, which Her Majesty's Ministers think quite sufficient to fill all the void in the minds of the people of England and Ireland—for it appears that we are to have a Session devoted chiefly to foreign policy—I wish to guard against the idea that Ireland concurs in or is satisfied with the foreign policy of England. The Irish people are disposed to support a policy founded on good faith and justice, and which will make this great country invulnerable to its enemies. To effect this, however, they must be united among themselves; and if the tone of the speech of the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) is to be regarded as an expression of the sentiments of this House, I am sure they will not be united. It is a calumny to say as, I trust, will be proved to demonstration in the course of this Session, that it is the intention of the Irish Members to obstruct legislation in this House. Their desire, on the contrary, is that the grievances of their country should be redressed, and they will endeavour to give the Government and the House an opportunity of redressing them.

Mr. RONAYNE said, he had also heard with great astonishment the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) congratulate his country on being treated with sovereign contempt. With regard to the alleged prosperity of Ireland, if the statements he had been hearing on that subject from his youth upwards, from Lords Lieutenant, and in Speeches from the Throne, were true, Ireland ought to be the wealthiest and most prosperous country in the world. He knew nothing personally about the linen trade of the North, which the hon. Member had described as being in a prosperous condition, but he had been assured by many gentlemen who were connected with that trade that for the last three years it had been the reverse of prosperous, and that there was nothing but grumbling and growling at its state. If bad trade, small profits, short time for the workers, and several heavy failures were evidence of prosperity the hon. Member was right, not otherwise. With regard to the rest of the country, if the hon. Member had given them the number of Civil Bill processes, the number of notices to quit, and the number of ejectments which had been issued last year he would have furnished them with some means of forming an idea of the prosperity of the country. The Chairman of the Munster Bank, a Member of that House, had recently stated to his constituents that last year was the worst the bank had ever had. With respect to the deposits in the Irish banks, which had been said to have increased, they did not, taken altogether, equal the amount deposited in the London and Westminster Bank alone. He denied that the increase of deposits in the Irish banks was any proof of the prosperity of the country; the reason was that the people had more security now than they felt they had formerly, and they now kept less money in their own hands, and they were encouraged to do so because, in addition to security, they also received interest upon their deposits. Some years ago there were several grounds which prevented them from having any confidence in the banks, and among them such banks as the Sadlier's banks. It was true that labouring men in Ireland now had better wages and more continuous occupation than they used to have, but a shilling used to go twice as far as it did now, and the existence of higher wages was owing to the fact that there were fewer hands. You had got rid of the surplus population, half of them had gone to their graves and half to America, and, of course, the people that remained were better off; but that did not prove that Ireland was wealthier or more productive. For instance, if two persons had a little shop by which they earned 10s. a-week between them, they would be starving, if you killed one, the other would be comparatively well off, but that would be no proof that the shop was producing any more. The produce of Ireland had decreased, the land of Ireland was going out of cultivation, and the people were decreasing, and he could not therefore allow the House to be misled by a misstatement as to the prosperity of the country which was not borne out by facts. These things indicated in other countries decline, but in Ireland they were regarded as signs of prosperity.

Mr. WARD said, that the Irish Members in that House and the people of Ireland outside its walls were aware that Ireland was neglected, and had not the just measure of legislation that she was entitled to. They were told that if they brought the grievances and requirements of Ireland before the English Parliament, they would obtain a just consideration and redress. Now, he must say that there were many, very many questions in Ireland which called for just legislation, and which had not yet received it; and it was only three years ago the then Prime Minister declared that the state of education in Ireland was intolerably bad and called for legislative improvement; yet now, after three years, there had not been a single proposal put forward by Her Majesty's Government to improve the state of education in that country. They were told that something was to be done for University education in England; but not a single proposition for relieving the educational wants of Ireland was made by the Government. The only other topic to which he would advert was one of some delicacy. He meant the question of dealing with the political prisoners. The present was a favourable opportunity for the Government to have done a graceful act by enabling Her Gracious Majesty to announce in Her Speech that there had been an end put to the imprisonment of those men who had already expiated any offence of which they had been guilty by a most cruel imprisonment of 10 years. There was a large mass of people in Ireland, and in England also, who considered it cruel and impolitic to keep those men in prison any longer, especially after the liberation of their leaders.

SIR JOHN SCOURFIELD wished that Her Majesty's Government would redress the grievances which arose in this country from the importation of cattle from Ireland. On one side of the water the Government Inspector passed the cattle, and on this side he stopped them. He considered it unjust to impose expenditure on one county for carrying out the cost of quarantine in another. He thought instructions ought to be given to the Government Inspectors to regulate matters in reference to this question in a just and satisfactory manner.

MR. PARNELL said, the Prime Minister might be assured that the continued imprisonment of the Irish prisoners was not conducive either to the interests of humanity or the interests of his Government. It was not worth the while of the Government to keep Ireland in a chronic state of discontent by keeping these men in prison, and the Government could do nothing which would give such satisfaction to Irishmen as the release of the political prisoners. They were not even ringleaders, but brave soldiers and sailors who had fought well for England.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Report of Address brought up, and read.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was anxious to take that opportunity of expressing the regret he felt, and which he believed would be very widely shared by the House, that in the gracious Speech from the Throne no allusion was made to the present condition of the Royal Navy of this country. He could not doubt that the people of the country regarded the management of the affairs of the Navy and its condition as highly unsatisfactory. He would not go into the matter then; but he considered this a question of primary importance, and he regretted that there was no acknowledgment on the part of the Government that this was a vital question. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would not repeat the policy which they indulged in, and which they inherited from their Predecessors of allowing the Navy Estimates to be brought forward at a time when it was not possible that they could be properly discussed. The importance of this subject was paramount to that of every other question that would be brought before the House. He hoped that the Navy Estimates would be laid before the House at the very earliest period, so that they might be properly examined and discussed.

Address agreed to:—To be presented by Privy Councillors.

SUPPLY.

Resolved, That this House will, upon Friday, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolved, That this House will, upon Friday, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

INCREASE OF THE EPISCOPATE BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE moved for leave to bring in a Bill for enabling Her Majesty and Her Successors to divide Dioceses, and to erect additional Bishoprics in England and Wales.

MR. DILLWYN said, that, assuming the Bill to be the same as that brought in last year, he had some doubts whether he ought not to ask the House not to allow its introduction. He knew that it was the practice of the House to allow the introduction of Bills, and he thought it was sometimes a very inconvenient practice. He considered that this was not a Bill which ought to be brought in by a private Member. He thought that last year, with reference to this Bill, his hon. Friend, himself a model of academic propriety, strained the Forms of the House, and had not shown the consideration which might have been expected from him. However, two wrongs did not make one right, and he did not like sharp practice, and he would not meet discourtesy by discourtesy. In the hope that his hon. Friend would not resort to the tactics adopted last Session, and that Members might not be put to the trouble of carefully watching the Bill, he would not oppose its introduction.

HOUSE OF LORDS

Thursday, 10th February, 1876

NEW PEERS.

William Earl of Abergavenny been created Earl of Lewes County of Sussex and Marquis of Abergavenny in the County of Devon—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD (Earl of CHAMP) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

MY LORDS,

I THANK you sincerely for your dutiful Address.

It will always be My earnest endeavour to operate with you in promoting the welfare and contentment of My People.

QUESTION. OBSERVATION.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTINGHAM said that the subject on which he had given Notice was one which had excited much attention throughout the

that he did not need to apologize to their Lordships for calling attention to it. The noble Duke the President of the Council had paid so much attention to the subject that until he read the speech of the noble Duke at Chichester some short time ago he was not aware of the difficulties which the Government had to encounter in dealing with this question as regarded Ireland. Until he read that speech he expected to find the Regulations of the Privy Council made uniform throughout the United Kingdom. Their Lordships would recollect that in 1873 a Committee of the House of Commons, presided over by Mr. Forster, was appointed to inquire into the matter; and that in their Report they made several recommendations which were adopted by the late Government and carried out by the Privy Council. One of those recommendations was that as regarded foot-and-mouth disease all restrictions should be removed. But in 1874, when the present Government came into office, these Regulations were altered, and they issued an Order in Council by which local authorities were empowered to reimpose restrictions, if they thought them required; and the result was that there were at present in many localities Regulations altogether at variance with the recommendation of the Committee of 1873, while in others there were no restrictions whatever. He approved the action of the Lord President in the appointment of additional inspectors, and for the efforts they had made to secure the sanitary condition of the vessels in which cattle were imported into this country. He believed also that great good had resulted from the better cleansing of trucks and lairs; but the great blot on the present Regulations was that the local authorities were enabled to do something or to do nothing, just as they might think fit. The result was that, of two places sending cattle to the same market, the one might have restrictions while the other might have none. The spirit of the recommendation of the Committee of 1873 was that there should be uniformity of practice throughout the whole Kingdom in respect to cattle diseases. The Committee drew a broad distinction between foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia. As regarded the former they recommended the withdrawal of all restrictions, while as to the latter they were to be retained; and the result was that for want of sufficient Regulations to guide the discretion of the local authorities there was not that uniformity of action which was contemplated by the Committee. In most counties in England these restrictions were enforced and penalties were inflicted on those who drove cattle so diseased along the high road; whereas in Ireland there were no restrictions whatever imposed upon the free transit of cattle from one part of the country to another. As regarded foot-and-mouth disease, he thought it was both desirable and easy that the Regulations should be uniform throughout the whole country; and therefore he hoped that the Regulations, like their distinguished relative the Slave Circular, would be withdrawn. As respected pleuro-pneumonia, he thought it indefensible that while in England the compulsory slaughter of animals affected with that disease, with compensation to the owners, should be the law, no such provisions should exist in Ireland. It was believed that in Ireland the farmers were at one time opposed to the compulsory slaughter of animals attacked with pleuro-pneumonia; but he had recently read, with pleasure, that at a meeting of the Irish Cattle Defence Association that body expressed its readiness to concur in any restrictions which the Privy Council might think fit to impose. There was much uneasiness on those points in the public mind at present, and therefore he begged to ask the Lord President, Whether it is intended to withdraw the present Privy Council Regulations respecting Foot-and-Mouth disease among Cattle; and whether steps will be taken to place the Regulations regarding Cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases upon the same footing in Ireland as in England?

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that as the Privy Council seemed to contemplate the foot-and-mouth diseases with considerable equanimity, it would be well that the losses which had been sustained should not be under-estimated. One cause of loss had been omitted in all the Correspondence on the subject and figures which he had seen, and that was the loss of calves, for cows which had had the foot-and-mouth disease often slipped their calves.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could assure the noble Lord who had just spoken that

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that as the Privy Council seemed to contemplate the foot-and-mouth diseases with considerable equanimity, it would be well that the losses which had been sustained should not be under-estimated. One cause of loss had been omitted in all the Correspondence on the subject and figures which he had seen, and that was the loss of calves, for cows which had had the foot-and-mouth disease often slipped their calves.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could assure the noble Lord who had just spoken that the Privy Council did not contemplate the foot-and-mouth disease with equanimity. If the noble Lord had been in the Privy Council Office for the last three years he would have known that. Deputations on the subject were received in great numbers, and scarcely a week passed in which the subject was not brought under their consideration. He could assert that in its action the Privy Council had been actuated by the desire to do everything possible to stop a disease which was injurious to all classes—not only to agriculturists, but to consumers. But the Privy Council had to devise measures such as would mitigate the evil without doing grievous injury to any one class—they had to consider what the effect of any measure would be, not only on the producers, but on the consumers of the country. It was rather unfortunate that in the discussion of measures for stamping out cattle diseases, persons at agricultural meetings and in farmers' clubs were very apt to mix up foot-and-mouth disease with pleuro-pneumonia, when the two diseases were very different, and called for, perhaps, very different forms of treatment at the hands of the Privy Council. The noble Marquess was perfectly correct in his statement that in 1873 the Committee of the House of Commons recommended the removal of all restrictions in respect of foot-and-mouth disease, and that, in accordance with that recommendation, the Privy Council revoked its Order. But shortly after the present Government came into office, numerous deputations waited on him (the Duke of Richmond) from various parts of the country, representing that foot-and-mouth disease was not only prevalent, but on the increase, and asking the Government to re-impose the restrictions. Among those who thus applied to the Privy Council were deputations representing such important districts and bodies as the East Riding of Yorkshire, South Devon, Cornwall, and Derbyshire, the Cheshire and Nottinghamshire Chambers of Agriculture, and the Royal Agricultural Society. He felt that he could not altogether disregard representations and requests urged by the deputations from such influential bodies; and the course the Privy Council took was to issue an Order enabling local authorities to impose restrictions if they thought it desirable to do so. He gave those authorities credit for care and watchfulness in the matter. The result had been that of 52 counties in England and Wales 41, and of 32 in Scotland 20, had imposed restrictions. In reply to the first Question of the noble Marquess, he had to say that it was not intended to withdraw the Order in Council under which those restrictions were imposed by local authority. He now came to the much more important subject of pleuro-pneumonia. The noble Marquess said that until he read his speech at Chichester he had not been acquainted with the difficulties which the Government had to encounter with respect to regulations in Ireland; but if the noble Marquess had done him the honour to read his speeches in that House he would have known that so far back as 1874 he stated those difficulties in answer to a noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) who had filled the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that the noble Earl concurred with him as to the existence of those difficulties. First of all, the Privy Council in England had no power to deal with matters which were within the province of the Privy Council of Ireland. Next, there were not proportionately in Ireland so many qualified veterinary inspectors as in this country. But he had never failed to see—what must be evident to every man of common sense—the anomaly of having in England a compulsory slaughter of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia, while no such measure was applied to Ireland. It must be borne in mind that in England there were local authorities over every part of the country, while in Ireland the only local authority was the Irish Privy Council itself. It was manifest that where there were local authorities such as those existing in England there was greater security that such a measure as compulsory slaughter, with the payment of compensation which it involved, would be applied in proper cases only. But the question had engaged the anxious attention of the Government ever since he had been in office; and he was happy to say that the Government did intend to enforce the compulsory slaughter in Ireland of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia. His right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland would introduce into the other House of Parliament a Bill having that object in view, and would state the manner in which it was proposed to effect it,

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

LORD EMLY expressed his satisfaction with the course which the Government intended to take, and said it was a mistake to suppose that the farmers in Ireland were opposed to the slaughter of cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia; but he regretted that in opposition to the opinion so decidedly expressed by the Committee of the House of Commons, against its urgent restrictions on cattle affected with foot-and-mouth disease, these restrictions were to be continued. Rules such as those for beasts affected with pleuro-pneumonia, could be imposed in the case of a disease which caused a mortality of only three per 1,000, and any less stringent rules would be entirely ineffectual.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY also wished to express his satisfaction at the decision come to by the Government with respect to Ireland. He thought the noble Duke was quite right in keeping foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia apart, because there was a great difference between the two. He was one of those who doubted very much the expediency of the restrictions in the case of foot-and-mouth disease; but, whatever might be their value if fairly tried, they had not a fair trial under the present system. They could not have such a trial as long as they were in force in some counties while they were not applied at all in others—to be of any value they must be extended to the whole country. He did not say that the Government would have been justified in rejecting the representations made by numerous deputations to the noble Duke in 1874; but he thought that since a considerable majority of the counties were in favour of restrictions, there could be no difficulty in applying them to all. He believed he might say it was the general opinion of agriculturists that if restrictions were to exist at all, they ought to be of a severer character than those now in force. It had been said—not in that House, but in other places—that agriculturists sought for restrictions in order to benefit themselves by enhancing the price of meat. This charge was unfounded. The disease enhanced the price of meat more than any restrictive regulations were likely to do. It was quite as much in the interest of the consumer as it was in that of the producer that compulsory slaughter in the case of pleuro-pneumonia should be extended to Ireland.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, it was a general opinion among agriculturists that there should be more protection against diseased cattle from Ireland. The Agricultural Society ascertained some years ago that the steamers in which Irish cattle were imported propagated disease; and it had been shown that cattle so imported did not in some cases exhibit symptoms of disease at the landing-place, though after they had been conveyed to their destination inland they were ascertained to be affected.

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN ACT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS, in putting a Question respecting the Agricultural Children Act, said, he trusted the importance of the subject in our agricultural districts would be a sufficient excuse for his intruding on the time and the attention of their Lordships' House. He thought it was a great advantage that his Question would be put in that House, where they had the advantage of the presence of the noble Duke, who, besides being the St. Anthony of the Government, and having the care of the animals, was also the Minister of Education. He need not remind their Lordships that the Agricultural Children Act was introduced by Mr. Clare Sewell Read and Mr. Pell, two Gentlemen well qualified to represent the agricultural interests. The Bill provided no machinery for putting its provisions into force; the police, however, had been brought into requisition in some counties, but in others it was not so, and conspicuous among the latter was the county of Buckingham, where it was reported that Mr. Disraeli voted against their being so used. The Prime Minister would not give a heedless vote in a leisure hour to support a state of things which rendered the Act of Parliament a dead letter. The measure, he must admit, was unpopular among the farming population and the voting classes in the counties; but the illustrious head of Her Majesty's Government was the last person to obstruct an Act of Parliament in order to secure the approbation of his constituents. He (the Duke of St. Albans) was, therefore, driven to the conclusion that the Government had some remedy to propose. It was not his business to point out the evil that existed on that occasion, or what should be done; though he quite admitted that the employment of the police in the relations the Act dealt with was most objectionable, if it could be avoided. They had, however, given the Act a good trial, and he had this to observe, that the present state of things ought no longer to exist. The ancient divisions of counties were eccentric to our ideas; and how were they to justify to the farmer and labourer in one parish the justice of his obeying a law which his neighbours on the other side of a fence could avoid? He might instance the fact of two farmers who, as he was informed, had been fined 6*l.* and costs at Huntingdon. They refused to pay, and a distress warrant was issued. He was afraid those persons had the full sympathy of their class; and it must be confessed it was difficult to see why they should be subjected to the ignominy of a fine, while the farmer in Buckinghamshire was exempt, and the head of the Government supported his position. He begged to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate any steps to give effect to the Agricultural Children Act and to secure uniformity of action under its provisions in the several counties?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, their Lordships were aware that in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne an announcement was made that a Bill would be introduced on the subject of Primary Education. It must be obvious to everybody who had looked into the question that no Bill dealing with that subject could overlook the education of children in the agricultural districts. His noble Friend (Lord Sandon) would introduce in the House of Commons a Bill on the subject of Primary Education at no distant date, and would state the intentions of the Government. Their Lordships would see, therefore, that he could not be expected on the present occasion to give any further reply to the Question of the noble Duke.

LORD COTTESLOE said, there was a misapprehension as to the course taken by the Prime Minister in Buckinghamshire with reference to the question. At the Quarter Sessions it was proposed to employ the police to enforce the Act. A magistrate moved the previous question, and it was for this latter motion Mr.

Disraeli and the majority of the magistrates recorded their votes.

ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES AND FEES BILL.

A Bill to reform certain Ecclesiastical Offices and to regulate Ecclesiastical Fees—Was presented by The Lord Archbishop of CANTERBURY; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 3.)

To-morrow, half past

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 10th February, 1876.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Standing Orders, nominated; Selection, nominated; Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms (House of Commons), appointed and nominated.

PUBLIC BILLS — Resolutions in Committee — Ordered — First Reading — Maritime Contracts [50]; Merchant Shipping [49]; Intoxicating Liquors (Licensing Law Amendment) [56].

Ordered — First Reading — Local Government in Towns (Ireland) * [52]; County Palatine of Lancaster (Clerk of the Peace) * [53]; Commons [51]; Indian Legislation [54]; Contagious Diseases Acts Repeal * [55]; Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday * [57]; Union Rating (Ireland) * [58].

Second Reading — Offences against the Person [1].

NAVY — THE LOSS OF H.M.S. "VANGUARD." — QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he intends to lay Papers upon the Table of the House relating to the loss of Her Majesty's Ship "Vanguard" and the proceedings taken subsequent thereto; and, whether he intends to take that, or, if not, what other opportunity of making a Statement to the House on the subject?

MR. HUNT: Sir, when the right hon. Gentleman gave Notice of this Question, Papers on the subject had already been laid on the Table of the House. I gave instructions that they should be ready for delivery to hon. Members at the opening of the Session, and I understand that to-morrow morning they will be in their hands. With regard to the second part of the right hon. Gentleman's Question, I do not know of any appropriate occasion for making a statement on the subject, so far as the initiative is concerned, except when it will be my duty to lay the Navy Estimates before the House. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman wishes to invite the opinion of the House on the subject, I shall be very glad for him to do so, and I will endeavour so to arrange with my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, so that he shall have every facility afforded to him for the purpose.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that in consequence of the Answer of the right hon. Gentleman, and in the belief—which he thought was shared in by the right hon. Gentleman himself—that the subject of the loss of the Vanguard could not be discussed with advantage on the Navy Estimates, he (Mr. Goschen) would give Notice that he should take an early opportunity, after the Papers had been laid on the Table of the House, of calling the attention of Parliament to the question. Deprecating, as he did, any attack upon the right hon. Gentleman, he should have preferred that he had volunteered a statement.

WEST COAST OF AFRICA—THE GAMBIA —EXCHANGE OF TERRITORY.

QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any negotiations have been entered into by Her Majesty's Government with respect to the cession or exchange of the Gambia territory; and whether Papers upon the subject will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, negotiations, as the right hon. Gentleman was aware, with respect to an exchange of territory upon the West Coast of Africa were entered into some time ago between the French and English Governments, but had not yet been brought to a conclusion, nor would any final step be taken until an opportunity had been afforded to Parliament for a consideration of all the questions involved. Papers upon the subject were being prepared, and would shortly be presented to the House.

THE CIVIL SERVICE INQUIRY COMMISSION—THE REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. DUNBAR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government have yet arrived at any decision upon the recommendations contained in the Report of the Civil Service Inquiry Commission, which was presented early last Session; and, whether he intends to take steps this Session to carry out all or any of those recommendations affecting the re-organization of the Civil Service?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government had given very careful consideration to the valuable and able Report of the Commission referred to, and a draft Order in Council which had been prepared would be submitted to Her Majesty on the occasion of the next Privy Council, which, he believed, would be held in the course of a few days. As soon as that draft Order had received Her Majesty's sanction he should be prepared to lay it on the Table of the House.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS —THE EXETER ENDOWED SCHOOLS SCHEME.—QUESTION.

MR. WADDY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, When the scheme for the management of St. John's Hospital and other Charities and Endowments in the city of Exeter, and certain other Charities and Endowments, which was laid upon the Table of the House in August 1875, was approved by the Committee of Council on Education; and, whether, before approval by the Committee of Council on Education, the scheme submitted by the Endowed Schools Commissioners was remitted to them by the Committee of Council on Education; and, if so remitted, if he would state to the House on what date; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Declaration accompanying such remission?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the scheme was approved by the Committee of Council on the 20th of March, 1875. The scheme was remitted on the 15th of March, 1875, to the Charity Commissioners before approval by the Committee of Council. If the hon. and learned Member will favour me by calling at the Privy Council Office, I shall be happy to show him the Paper to which he alludes; and if he should then think that it is of any public interest, I will at once lay it upon the Table of the House.

THE IRISH LAND ACT—COMPENSATION UNDER THE THIRD CLAUSE.

QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will lay upon the Table of the House, on as early a day as possible, a Return giving the amount awarded in compensation under the third Clause of the Land Act, since the passing of the Act, showing the amount in each county, and distinguishing between the sums awarded as compensation for improvements, and the sums awarded as compensation for disturbance?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that information on the point alluded to in the Question of the hon. Member was already tabulated in the statistics which were in the possession of the House, though not in the form, perhaps, which he desired. If the hon. Member would confer with him on the subject, he would endeavour to arrange what additional information on the subject should be laid before Parliament.

SCOTLAND—THE LAW OF HYPOTHEC.

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAGAN asked the honourable Member for Wigtonshire, Whether it is his intention to introduce this Session a Bill for the abolition of the Landlord's rights of Hypothec in Scotland?

MR. VANS AGNEW, in reply, said, he had not as yet moved for leave to introduce a Bill for the abolition of the Landlord's right of Hypothec in Scotland, because last Session they were given to understand that Her Majesty's Government intended to introduce a Bill on the subject of agricultural holdings in Scotland similar to that which had been passed for England. If he was disappointed in the hope that such measure would deal with the question of Hypothec, he should be prepared to bring the subject before the House in the form of an Amendment to the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Bill,

SELECT COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN LOANS—THE HONDURAS MINISTER.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps Her Majesty's Government have taken, in consequence of the facts established by the evidence taken before the Select Committee of this House on Foreign Loans, with reference to the continuance of Don Carlos Gutierrez as the Representative of Honduras in this country?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, it had not been found necessary to take any official steps with regard to Don Carlos Gutierrez, as, in consequence of unofficial communications which had been addressed to him, he had resigned his position as the Representative of Honduras in this country.

DOVER HARBOUR BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. FRESHFIELD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Government has abandoned the measure introduced into the House last Session, and which passed through a Select Committee (but was afterwards dropped) for completing the Harbour and works at Dover, or what is its intention regarding it?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, the amount of works which the Government had to undertake during the present year was so considerable that it had been found necessary to put off proceeding with Dover Harbour for the present.

CHINA—THE PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to our recent differences with China will be in the hands of Members?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, he could not exactly fix the date at which the Papers would be in the hands of hon. Members; but as they were at present in the hands of the printers, he hoped that very shortly he should be able to present them to the House.

MINES—BLASTING POWDER.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

If it is his intention or the intention of the Government to introduce a measure this Session to prohibit the use of blasting powder in firing Mines?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the opinions of the Mines Inspectors as to the use of blasting powder in firing mines were so widely different that he did not at present propose to introduce a Bill on the subject. The question would be again submitted to the Inspectors on their next meeting in London, which he believed would be within a fortnight, and as soon as he received a Report upon the subject it would be laid before the House.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH CARDS.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Postmaster General, Whether Telegraph Cards will be reissued; and, if not, if he will explain to the House why this convenience is to be withdrawn from the public?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, it was not intended to issue any further telegraph cards, the experience of more than three years having shown clearly that the public could not be induced to use them.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH PORTUGAL.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government of Portugal has decided to give the Most Favoured Nation Clause to this country with respect to the importation of British goods into Portugal?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the Chamber of Deputies of Portugal had quite recently passed a Bill extending to Great Britain and other countries the commercial privileges attaching to the Franco-Portuguese Treaty of 1866, and the effect of that measure would be to extend to Great Britain the Most Favoured Nation Clause. This country, however, in reality, had been entitled to the advantages of that clause ever since the Treaty of 1842.

THE SUEZ CANAL COMPANY.—THE CONCESSION AND FIRMAN.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will lay on the Table of the House, before he brought on the Vote for the purchase of the Suez Canal Shares, the concession and statutes of the Suez Canal Company, referred to in General Stanton's despatch to Lord Derby, of December 11, 1875, and also the Firman of the Sultan confirming the concession to the Egyptian Government?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I shall have much pleasure, Sir, in laying the Papers on the Table of the House.

EGYPT—INSTRUCTIONS TO MR. CAVE. NOTICE.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON gave Notice that to-morrow he would ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Instructions given to Mr. Cave with regard to his mission to Egypt, and also of the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Khedive in relation to the subject.

BILL.—[BILL 1.]

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Whitwell.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHARLEY, in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, said, it was substantially identical with the Infanticide Bill, as amended in Committee last Session. It would be in the recollection of the House that the scope of that Bill was enlarged in Committee. Originally confined to cases in which death was caused by the injuries inflicted by the mother on her child during or immediately after its birth, the scope of the Bill was enlarged in Committee to all cases in which grievous bodily harm was inflicted by the mother on her child during or immediately after its birth. Whether death was caused thereby or not, the name, "Infanticide Bill," no longer, therefore, defined accurately the scope of the Bill, and the wider term "Offences Against the Person," had been adopted as a more appropriate title. The name "Infanticide," moreover, although used by statisticians to denote the murder of a new-born infant by its mother, was, as pointed out by the Capital Punishment

Commissioners, unknown to the English law. Infanticide was only one form of murder. It was a matter of doubtful policy to coin a new legal phrase, and it was now no longer necessary, the scope of the Bill having been enlarged. The Bill came before the House supported by a great weight of authority. It was founded on the unanimous recommendations of the Capital Punishment Commissioners. That Commission was presided over by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond), and amongst the signatures to its recommendations would be found the names of three other Members of the present Cabinet. He might add that amongst the signatures to the recommendations he found the name of a right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). The Bill had been read a second time without a division in three successive Sessions—namely, 1873, 1874, and 1875. In 1874 it was sent up to the House of Lords in the form in which it passed the Committee on Homicide, a form of which it was difficult to approve. In 1875 the Bill would have been sent up to the House of Lords in its present form, if it had not been for the unaccountable opposition of the late hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance), whose loss as an old and respected Member of that House they all deplored. On the second reading of the Bill last Session, it was supported by the right hon. and learned Recorder, the present Attorney General, the Attorney General of the late Government, and the hon. and learned Members for Durham, Penryn, South Derbyshire, South Warwickshire, and he might add, for Beaumaris—subject to certain Amendments which were now embodied in the Bill. He would appeal to these facts as his justification for urging on the second reading of the Bill thus early in the Session. It was important that the House of Lords, and especially the Law Lords, should have ample time to consider the Bill. He hoped that the Bill would do away with the necessity of trying a woman for an offence of which it was impossible to convict her—that it would afford a means of overcoming the technical rule of the necessity of establishing that there was an independent circulation in the child apart from its mother, which had so often led to a defeat of justice—that it would lead to a decrease in the crime of infanticide, which was the disgrace of our modern civilization—50 out of 51 murders being, according to Dr. Neilson Hancock, infanticide—while, at the same time, it would guard the sacredness of the lives of infants by enabling the prosecutor to proceed for the major offences of murder or manslaughter, if he thought that he could secure a conviction, and that it would better meet the justice of the case. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he strongly objected to the House being called upon to read the Bill a second time, at that early period of the Session. He could not help thinking it somewhat unreasonable that they should be called upon to pass the second reading—that was, to affirm the principle of a measure which had only been delivered that morning, and within 24 hours, or scarcely more, from the introduction of the Bill. What he was anxious to obtain was time for its due consideration, and whatever might be the ultimate event of the measure, so far as Parliament was concerned, it was very desirable, or indeed actually necessary, that the scope of the Bill should be thoroughly understood. Although that was the chief reason by which he was actuated, he had also this further objection to adduce—namely, that he thought any proposed change in the framework of a law which must necessarily be of such great importance, ought to be made—if at all—by the responsible officers of the Crown. So far as he understood the suggested alteration, the Bill proposed to insert in an indictment the word "feloniously," in place of "unlawfully," thus transforming the charge from a misdemeanour into a felony. He must confess that he thought the present law was sufficient for the purpose—as he understood it—in view; and he had strong doubts as to the advisability of anything like piecemeal legislation on such an important subject. He had to remind the House that, in cases of this character, it often happened that a woman, at the very time she was said to have committed the alleged offence, was not always responsible for her own actions, and however much he might feel for the preservation of infant life, he thought it was absolutely necessary to take especial care of the position of the unfortunate mother in such cases. In conclusion, he would move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

Mr. WHITWELL trusted that the House would consent to read the Bill a second time without further delay, on the ground that the principle of the measure had been fully discussed and approved last Session. In his opinion it was a most important measure, and one which ought to be passed, as it was founded on principles of humanity and justice. He should therefore support the second reading.

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD said, the Bill in its present shape was the Bill that was read a third time last Session. He opposed the Bill in its original shape last Session, but certain alterations had been made, and the consequence was, he believed the majority of the legal profession in the House approved the present measure.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the Bill, as he understood, was exactly in the same form as the measure which was introduced last Session, except that it had a different title. It appeared to him that the Bill was worthy of support for this reason—that it was designed to remedy a very considerable defect in the law—namely, that under existing Acts, when a woman was indicted for the murder of her child, and the evidence was such that no one could for an instant doubt that a grave crime had been committed, such, for instance, as wounds inflicted upon the body, or a cord round its neck, she might escape according to the law as it now stood, because it could not be clearly proved by medical or other evidence that the child had had an existence apart from the mother. It was to remedy this that the Bill provided that when a woman unlawfully or maliciously inflicted grievous bodily harm upon a child at or immediately after its birth, then although it could not be proved that a separate circulation had been set up in the system of the child, she should be punishable for the offence she had committed. He saw no injustice in that. The object of the Bill was to prevent a criminal from escaping, and he thought the provisions of the Bill for that purpose were so wisely framed that it was entitled to support. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) seemed to think that this Bill would put in jeopardy a woman who had inflicted injury on her child when she was in a state that rendered her not responsible for her actions. But that could not be, because no Judge would be justified under this Bill in directing a jury to convict, and no jury would be justified in convicting, unless it was clearly proved that the injury was inflicted maliciously. When the Bill was before the House last Session he supported it, because he thought it was a good and useful measure, and for the same reason he should support it now.

MARITIME CONTRACTS BILL.

MARITIME CONTRACTS considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in rising to move, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Insurances and other Maritime Contracts, said: Sir, the Committee are well aware from the terms of the Queen's Speech that it is the intention of the Government at the very commencement of this Session to invite the attention of Parliament to the question of legislation with respect to Merchant Shipping, and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has given Notice that he will this evening move to introduce a Bill upon the subject. But, in the course of the careful consideration which the Government have given to this subject during the Recess, it has appeared to them that any legislation upon this matter would be incomplete unless it extended beyond the subjects which will be included in the Bill which my right hon. Friend has to introduce, and upon that consideration they have come to the conclusion that it would be desirable that two measures should be introduced, independent one of the other, but forming, when taken together, a complete exposition of their views as to the legislation which is required and which is possible at the present time upon this great question. I will not weary the Committee—indeed, I should be trespassing on the province of my right hon. Friend if I were to do so—by going into anything like a general review of the course of legislation with regard to Merchant Shipping of late years. I will only say this much with regard to it. The Committee will bear in mind that for 30 or 40 years the attention of Parliament has been directed at constantly recurring intervals to measures for improving the condition of our Merchant Shipping, and especially for preserving life at sea; that a large code of laws has been created within that time, and that year after year the attention of the public has been called to it. Now the principles upon which the Government and successive Governments have proceeded in this matter seem to have been very much of this character—they have felt that it was the duty of Parliament, as far as possible, to give facilities for the improvement of the Mercantile Marine, and to pass such measures as should enforce the responsibility of shipowners and of those who have the conduct of the great Merchant Service of this country. But they have felt that it was rather in the direction of assisting on the one hand, and of enforcing on the other the duties of shipowners, than to direct intervention on the part of the Government by laying them under the restraints of penal legislation, that satisfactory results were to be looked for. And that certainly is the feeling which animates Her Majesty's present Advisers upon this matter. A great deal has been done in the way of improving the character of masters and mates, of improving the condition of seamen, and other matters with which hon. Gentlemen are familiar. Important measures have been taken for inquiring into the apportionment of the proper punishment in cases where it was required, and moreover, of late years, a new step has been taken in the direction of Government interference which may be shortly described as the initiation of a policy of detention—that is to say, powers have been given to the Government to detain ships when it appears they cannot proceed safely to sea, or when there is any reason to suspect they are at all unseaworthy. Last Session a measure was proposed which would have carried further that policy; but under circumstances to which I do not advert at any length, that measure was not proceeded with as had been intended, but a temporary measure—a short one—was passed towards the end of the Session, which will expire in the course of the present year. Now, the principles on which the Government propose to legislate this year will be in harmony with those which they professed last year. My right hon. Friend will by-and-by introduce a Bill which will be found in principle similar to the temporary measure which was passed at the close of last Session, but which will be found to meet some of the defects and difficulties which have been experienced in the working of that short temporary Act. But, in addition to that, it is the opinion of the Government that we should take a step further. That will be a step for enforcing more strictly than at present the liability of shipowners and throwing on them more distinctly the duty of taking care that their ships and the lives of their seamen on board of them are properly provided for. As I said before, whatever the Government can do in this matter the Government is attempting to do; but, after all, what the Government can do is as nothing compared with what the shipowners themselves can do. The Government may stop one or two patent leaks or prevent one or two patent evils; but, after all, it cannot take that care—that continuing, that efficient care—which a shipowner is himself liable and bound to take of his vessel; and it is, therefore, to the exertions of the shipowner that we are mainly to look for improvements in this matter. I wish, on the part of the Government, to say that we have approached this subject with an anxious desire to do justly and deal fairly with what may be called both of the parties interested in this controversy, if I may so describe it. We are, above all things, anxious to preserve and protect the valuable lives of our seamen. We are, on the other hand, anxious to take care that no unnecessary inconvenience is inflicted and no injury is done to that great interest on the prosperity and welfare of which so much of the prosperity of this Kingdom depends. We feel that a natural, a noble, and a generous impulse has led the people of this country to call loudly for the protection of those whose lives are, perhaps, more exposed to danger than the lives of most other classes, and who from various circumstances possess a peculiar interest in the eyes of Englishmen. And it may be that in some of the expressions which have been used and some of the proposals which have been made for the purpose of obtaining that great object something in the nature of injustice has from time to time been done to a body of men as honourable, as desirous to promote the welfare of those dependent on them, and as deserving of the consideration and attention of Parliament as any body of men in this country can possibly be. We have, therefore, been anxious to guard ourselves in what we may do from anything that may appear to reflect unfairly or in any way to be prejudicial to the great body of the shipowners. And, in saying that, I feel that we are not in any sense chargeable with the imputation that we are setting property against life, because not only is the property of the shipowner concerned in this matter and the national welfare greatly concerned, too, but also the interests of the seaman himself are involved in the maintenance of the general prosperity of that great interest in which he ranks as one of the component parts. If you destroy or materially injure the Merchant Service of this country, I need not ask what would be the effect on the merchant seaman. You cannot injure the shipowner without materially damaging and injuring the sailor; and not only is that in a general way the case, but it is also obvious that you may by over-restriction and over-regulation directly defeat your own object, because, inasmuch as you cannot prevent all mischief, if you lay too many restrictions and impose too many burdens on the shipowner he may defend himself by taking less care in those matters where you are not able to reach him. Now, looking at the subject from the simplest point of view, I think we may say that our seamen and all connected with ships would naturally have their great protection in the interest the shipowner must have in the preservation of his ship. Naturally, and in the absence of any legislation or of any system which might prevent the operation of that law, there would be a law by which the shipowner is more desirous of preserving his ship than any other person can be, because if his ship is lost he loses that which constitutes his property. But there has long prevailed in this country and elsewhere a system of insurance the effect of which is that if a man partially insures his ship he mitigates his loss; if he wholly insures her he covers his loss; and if he over-insures her it is possible that his loss may even become his gain. Therefore, unless proper attention is paid to this subject, and care is taken to prevent as far as possible the over-insurance of ships, it is possible that a system most excellent in its intentions, most valuable in its working, may be the cause of great abuse and evil. There is another point which I may also mention. Besides the natural interest which the shipowner would have but for the system of insurance in the protection and preservation of his ship, he is under obligation to the shippers who have consigned their cargoes to his care, and he would be responsible to those persons for any loss that might occur. He would, therefore, for the sake of protecting himself against that liability, naturally be anxious to take all possible pains to see that his ship was well found, well navigated, and of such a character as would enable him to accomplish the undertaking into which he has entered. But a practice has, as we know, arisen in many cases in which shipowners have found it possible to contract themselves out of this obligation by the introduction into their bills of lading of stipulations protecting them against losses which may occur to the cargoes committed to their charge. Well, Her Majesty's Government have carefully considered in what way it would be right to deal with these questions, and I wish to say that we have not attempted in any way to set aside the great principles of insurance or to deal on what may be called cardinal and doctrinaire principles with a matter which is of such old standing, which has so many ramifications, and is connected with so many interests. We feel that it would be a very serious thing—indeed, a very improper thing—rashly and in any violent manner to tamper with the system of insurance. We do not propose any great radical or revolutionary change in that system. We have not attempted to alter the principles upon which it rests, but we have endeavoured in the measure we shall submit to the Committee to meet certain of the objections which appear to us to lie on the face of the case and to be the most easily dealt with. It may be said—“Why do you touch contracts of this kind at all? Why cannot you leave the underwriters and the shipowners to regulate such matters as contracts of insurance in their own way?” Well, we recognize and feel the fact that it is a very serious thing indeed to interfere under any circumstances with full freedom of contract; and where contracts are made between parties who are competent on both sides to enter into them, and where they do not affect the interests and rights of other persons, we feel that it would be wrong and contrary to sound policy to meddle with freedom of contract. But when contracts are of such a nature that the interests of third persons are or may be involved in them, and those persons are not parties to or able to control those contracts, it may and does become the duty of the Legislature, at all events, to protect the rights of those who may suffer as third persons between the two parties. For example, not to speak of other matters less cognate to the present subject, you have in this very instance of Marine Insurance a provision of law that a seaman is unable to insure his wages. A seaman is interested in the wages which he will earn by the voyage in which he engages. It would be natural, considering that he is embarking in a very venturous and risky occupation, that he should be allowed to insure the wages he will receive if the voyage is completed. But the law does not allow him to do it, and for this reason—that it is thought if he were to insure his wages, and were sure of getting them whatever might happen to the ship, he would be rendered less careful in the discharge of his duty. And, therefore, for the sake of the interests of the owner of the ship, and also of the persons whose goods are in it, you restrain the seaman from that contract into which he naturally would have every right to enter. Well, if you employ law in this way against the seaman, it may also possibly be a consideration with you whether it would not be right that he in his turn should be protected in the application of that same system of insurance between other persons. I will not, however, detain the Committee by going at any length into theory on this matter. I think I shall best consult its convenience by describing very briefly the provisions of the Bill I am about to ask leave to introduce. It is a very short measure, and its provisions are not so numerous as its clauses. It contains, I think, 12 clauses, of which two or three are merely formal, and others only consequential. It deals with six points. In the first place, it treats of the question of warranty and of those stipulations in bills of lading by which shipowners are able to contract themselves out of their liability to the shippers of cargo. The Bill deals also with another class of interests which is not at present provided for. At the present time, supposing there be no provision in the bill of lading to take the case out of the Common Law of the land, the shipowner is liable for the safety of the cargo, but not for that of passengers. Therefore, in the 4th clause of the Bill, which is the first of any importance, it is provided that—

“In every contract made after the commencement of this Act for the carriage of goods or persons by sea there shall, by virtue of this Act, be an implied warranty by the shipowner, charterer, or other person contracting, that the ship is seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage to be performed under the contract.”

This is a novelty, for the passenger, in short, is here put on the same footing as the cargo. Then provision is made for rendering this warranty efficacious—that is to say, for preventing the shipowner from contracting himself out of his liability, for the clause further provides that any contract made after the commencement of the Act contrary to, or inconsistent with, such warranty is to that extent void. Passing over some minor points in the Bill, we come to Clause 8, dealing with the case of valued policies, about which there has been much controversy. In the case of open policies the shipowner insures his ship for such a sum as he thinks right, and in the event of a dispute arising, steps are taken to ascertain the ship's value, in accordance with principles which have been clearly laid down in a series of judicial decisions. We do not intend to interfere in that matter, except in some minor particulars which I need not here mention. But, in the case of valued policies the shipowner and underwriter at the commencement of the contract agree upon a certain sum—which may or may not be the fair and full value of the ship—as the value of the ship in the event of her loss. Well, this is, no doubt, a convenient practice. It saves, I dare say, a great deal of trouble and controversy, and if the valuation is fairly stated it is a practice with which no one would wish to interfere. But, on the other hand, it may be made to cover an excessive and unreasonable over-valuation, and it is perfectly clear that, if a man having a ship worth £10,000 insures her on a valued policy of £20,000, it may be more to his interest to lose her than that she should safely complete her voyage. God forbid that I should impute to shipowners as a class, or, indeed, to any man, that he would deliberately send his ship to sea over-valued in the hope that she may be lost; but I would point out that this practice of over-valuation exposes shipowners to very great temptation. And not only has it that effect, but it produces on seamen and the public at large an unsatisfactory feeling—namely, that the loss of a ship may be an actual gain to her owner, a feeling which cannot be at all good for the service. It cannot be satisfactory that that which is loss of life and property to a great mass of the population, should be not only no loss but a subject of gain to any one class of that population. It may be said that this over-valuation does not often occur, and that it is exceedingly difficult to say what the true value of a ship is. She may be of more value to one man than to another, or her value may vary according to the service in which she is engaged. In fact, there may be a great many considerations which render it difficult to fix the value of a ship with precision. Yet that difficulty has to be overcome, and is overcome every day by processes with which those who conduct them have become familiar. It may surprise some persons unacquainted with the working of the law in this matter to learn the discrepancy which sometimes comes out between the real value and the estimated value of a ship. There is a case, I suppose of not infrequent occurrence, which prominently brings out this point. A ship having been seriously damaged, the question arises whether she is to be treated as a total loss. In Courts of Law this case is known as “constructive total loss.” The principle of it is this:—If a ship has been so much damaged that it would cost more to repair her than her full value when repaired would be, she is judged to be totally lost, and if the policy is a valued one the underwriter has to pay the total amount for which she was insured. Well, if the ship is partially lost, the owner claims to receive the amount of the valuation, on the ground that she is totally lost. He is asked to prove that she is totally lost, and to do so he proves in the first place what the ship is really worth, and, secondly, what it would cost to repair her. In this way it sometimes comes out that what it would cost to repair a ship and what the owner proves she is really worth is very far below the amount at which he has valued her, and which he is entitled to recover. Let me just give an illustration of this. Some little time ago a case of constructive total loss was tried in respect of a ship valued at £36,000. The ship had been materially injured, and the owner endeavoured to prove that she was a total loss. With that view he showed that it would cost £15,000 to repair her, and that when repaired she would not be worth more than that sum. If he could make out that the ship was not worth more than £15,000 altogether, what is it to be supposed he would receive for her loss? Not £15,000, her true value, but £36,000, her assumed value. Probably cases of this kind are not numerous, but that they can occur is in itself sufficient evidence of the evil tendency of over-valuation. In the case I have just mentioned the Lord Chief Justice, who was trying it, was so much struck by the discrepancy between the real and the estimated value of the ship, that he adjourned the proceedings in order to give counsel an opportunity of considering what course they would pursue. How are we to deal with this kind of possible over-valuation? It has been suggested by some that we should prohibit valued policies altogether, but that is out of the question; others have recommended that the underwriter should at any time have power to open the valued policy. Well, we do not encourage that.

The provision we make is a very guarded, and, I think, a very reasonable one; and I do not know that I could state it better or more clearly than by reading the clause itself—

“Where, in an action on a contract of insurance on ship or freight made after the commencement of this Act by a valued policy, it appears to the Court, at any stage of the action, whether application in this behalf is made by the defendant or not, that there is ground to believe that the valuation is unreasonably in excess of the real value of the subject-matter of insurance, the Court may, if it thinks fit, direct an inquiry before referees, on such terms and conditions respecting costs and other matters as to the Court seem just, to ascertain what would have been the value of the interest of the insured, if the policy had been an open one. If, on the report of the referees, it appears to the Court that the valuation is unreasonably in excess of the real value of the subject-matter of insurance, then the insured shall not be entitled to recover in the action more than the value as ascertained by the referees.”

It goes upon the principle that the natural kind of policy is the open one, which, as construed by successive decisions, gives to the insurer the amount to which he is fairly entitled as compensation for the loss of his ship, and no more. The valuation policy is a device introduced for the convenience of parties. So far as it is legitimate we have no wish to interfere with it; but if the Court has reason to suppose that it is abused, then it sets it aside, and throws the insurance policy back into the natural position of an open policy. That is the most important and most striking provision in the Bill. The next clause relates to the case of freight. Now, with regard to freight it is, of course, right and necessary for the shipowner to insure, not only the body of the ship, but that which makes the ship valuable—the freight which it has to earn for the voyage in which it is engaged. A man expects when he sends his ship from London to Calcutta, or when he sends it from Calcutta to London, perhaps, with the view of the ship coming back, he expects to make certain profits out of the voyage. At present he may secure the gross amount of the freight which he has to receive, and certain expenses which he may have to incur. If, for instance, he expects to incur expenses to the amount of £500 and make a profit of £500, he will insure for £1,000, and if the voyage is complete he receives that which he is entitled to receive. But it may happen that before the ship has got far on her voyage she may be lost, and he will then be saved a great proportion of the expenses he would have to incur, and yet he would be entitled to receive the total amount at which he valued the gross freight, although not liable to various deductions to which, had the ship reached its destination, the freight would have been subject. We propose, therefore, to provide against that by the following clause:—

“Where there is an insurance on freight effected after the commencement of this Act, the insured shall not be entitled to recover in respect of any freight lost without allowing for the proportion of expenses remaining, at the time of the loss, to be incurred in earning such freight. The amount to be so allowed shall be ascertained or estimated as the Court, in any action on the contract, directs.”

I think that that is a condition naturally equitable, which will commend itself to any one who will take the trouble to consider the point. The next point which it is proposed to deal with is what is called double insurance—or I should rather say, insuring the same thing twice over in different forms, for the term “double insurance” has a different meaning. It is, I believe, understood that when a man insures his ship in the ordinary course he insures not only the ship itself, but also what is known as the outfit—the furniture, I think, is the usual expression; “furniture” being used to cover various items, such as wages of seamen and other charges. But as this outfit might also be reckoned over again in the insurance of freight, it may happen that a man may first of all insure this, and afterwards get it insured over again in his freight. It is obvious that that ought not to be so, and the mode in which we propose to deal with it is to provide that—

“Where an insurance on freight effected after the commencement of this Act covers cost of wages, outfit, and other charges, and that cost is also insured by any other policy effected by the same person, that cost shall be deemed to be the subject of a double insurance. So much of the cost aforesaid as has hitherto been covered by an open policy on ship shall, in case of a policy upon ship, whether open or valued, effected after the commencement of this Act, be deemed to be covered by that policy, unless expressly excluded thereby.”

Double insurance means that if a man insures his ship in one office, and then goes and insures it again in another office, he can only recover from one of these offices, and the other office may claim from the office to which he does not apply its contribution towards the amount insured. Suppose a man under the present system insures for £500 in two offices, he could only recover £500 in the whole; but suppose he insures his outfit once under the insurance of the ship, and again under the insurance of freight, he would be able under the present law to recover the sum twice over; but under this provision he will only be able to recover once. There is but one other point to which I need refer, and that is the question of time policies. There are two different policies—voyage policies and time policies. Voyage policies cover a ship from one port to another, and when a ship is insured for voyage only, a warranty is given on the part of the shipowner to the underwriter, that the ship is seaworthy at the commencement of her voyage. But there is another kind of policy which, I believe, is coming very much into use, and that is what is called a time policy. A man insures, not for a particular voyage, but for a particular period of time, generally for a year. That is the outside time for which a man can insure a ship. In the case of insurance by a time policy he is not understood to give any warranty whatever with regard to seaworthiness, and there are good enough reasons for that, because a ship might be in the middle of the ocean, and in that case it would be unreasonable to give a warranty. It is no doubt a harder thing to deal with insurance by time than insurance by voyage, because in the case of a voyage policy we know what upon the whole is likely to be the work the ship will have to perform, and what perils she will have to encounter. In the case of a time policy it is difficult to say what the work may be in the course of a year; therefore the provision we propose to make is this—That “Where an insurance on behalf of a shipowner on ship or freight by time is effected after the commencement of this Act, the insured shall not be entitled to recover in respect of any loss occurring, if the loss would not have occurred but for the unseaworthiness of the ship, and that unseaworthiness existed at the time of the ship leaving the port or place of safety (if any) in which she was at the commencement of the risk, or the port or place of safety in which she was last before the commencement of the risk, and could have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the owner or of the master of the ship, or of any agent of the owner, charged, as such, with the loading of the ship, or with the sending of her to sea from that port or place.”

There is a further provision that

“For the purposes of this section, unseaworthiness arising from the defective condition of the hull, equipments, or machinery of the ship, or by reason of overloading or improper loading, shall alone be deemed unseaworthiness.”

I have now endeavoured to explain the objects of the Bill, and I have explained what the proposals are that we have to submit. If we were now for the first time forming a code of Marine Insurance we might probably be inclined to frame somewhat different machinery, but we have kept in view the existing state of things and endeavoured to avoid the introduction of new terms or systems. We have endeavoured to amend patent and obvious blots, and we hope that the measure which we submit, which is the product of great thought and anxious consideration, however it may meet theoretical objections, will be found of considerable practical advantage in the direction in which we wish to go. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen wish to discuss the clauses of the Bill; I have no desire to limit discussion, but it may be more advantageous if the Bill is allowed to be printed before there is any general discussion. At the same time the matter is one of so much importance, and affects so many interests that I am anxious no mistake should be made, and that is why I have read the ipsissima verba of the clauses to which I have referred. If there is any point on which I have not made myself clear, I shall be most happy to answer whatever questions may be asked, but knowing that the House is anxious to hear my right hon. Friend, who will cover a large range of the subject, I have to apologize to him for having stood in the way of his more interesting statement. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. NORWOOD said, he had no desire to anticipate the full discussion of the measure that must ensue on the second reading of the Bill; but after its introduction by a speech of considerable length, enunciating the views of the Government on so important a subject, he wished to offer a few observations. He had not a word of disparagement to say with reference to the general tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, or the description he had given of the feeling that animated the Government in approaching the subject, and, speaking for his class, he (Mr. Norwood) could say that it was the desire of the shipping interest, not only to have a final and satisfactory settlement of this large question this Session, but, as far as possible, to work heartily and cordially with the Government in obtaining it. He regretted that the Government had decided upon entering upon so intricate, delicate, and difficult a subject as the alteration of the Law of Marine Insurance—which had been raised, not by statute, but by a series of decisions of past years by able Judges, confirmed by the highest Courts of Appeal, clearly understood and acted upon—without first having a full and complete investigation into the whole of the subject. There were strong and valid reasons why some of the Government propositions should not be carried out. As a member of Lloyd's and of several insurance clubs, he was able to state that the evils resulting from over-valuation were extremely light; not a dozen cases of the kind had come under his observation, and the view taken by the Royal Commission on this part of the subject ought to have some little weight in guiding the decision of Parliament. The Royal Commissioners did not recommend an alteration in the law as to total loss on valued policies, and said it would be unwise and unjust to interfere with contracts between the assured and underwriters, unless our whole system of Marine Insurance were completely revised and amended; and, further, that the revision of such laws was a task of great difficulty, requiring evidence of an exhaustive character, and careful and lengthy investigations, which did not fall within the scope of a Royal Commission. The right hon. Gentleman had not informed the House whether he intended to make any breach of the proposed law punishable by fine and imprisonment; but without it how could he prevent shipowners from joining together for mutual insurance or resorting to honour policies, and was he prepared to prevent, under severe penalty, any shipowner from insuring his vessel abroad, as was done now in Paris, Vienna, and St. Petersburg, and even in Switzerland? There was, then, ex-

trema danger in interfering with our present system of Marine Insurance by the machinery described by the right hon. Gentleman, as it might open the door to constant dispute and litigation. The effect would simply be, that instead of going to Lloyd's to insure, shipowners would adopt mutual insurances to a greater extent, and instead of effecting legal policies would enter into honour policies, under which they were more secure than any other form of policy. The right hon. Gentleman did not propose to deal with partial losses and other matters of much interest. He would not then go into details by which he could throw a different aspect on the description and elucidation of the right hon. Gentleman; but with regard to the tone in which he had introduced the subject he had not the slightest objection, and he had shown considerable mastery of a subject of a technical and detailed character. The interference with the law of contract as proposed was an interference that would be strongly objected to not only by shipowners, but by underwriters also, and as a member of Lloyd's he could say that there was a general objection to this interference. The whole of the shipowning body of the country were sincerely desirous to have a settlement of this question upon a broad basis that would satisfy the country, but they seriously objected to a question of such extreme difficulty and danger being opened without a full and complete inquiry, which they thought the importance of the subject deserved. So far as he was personally concerned, he would not take any step until he had perused the Bill; but he was disposed to anticipate it would be the duty of those who represented the shipping interest to move, on the second reading, that it was inexpedient to alter the present law without a full and complete investigation into the whole subject, either by a Royal Commission or a Committee of that House.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS congratulated the Government on having resolved to legislate on the important subject before the House, and upon the extreme moderation and caution with which they seemed to have approached it. The shipowners of this country were, he admitted, as a rule, a noble-minded body of men, but then they were not free from the evil to which every other great interest or profession was liable—that the profits which they realized attracted to them a certain number of persons who were unscrupulous and reckless, and who did not care what they did in order to put money in their pockets. Even the profession to which he had the honour to belong included some members whom they were sorry to see amongst them. Those who were experienced in the subject knew perfectly well that there were three great sources of danger to life in the carrying on of the shipping business. In the first place, the practice which had sprung up within the last 15 years, by which the shipowners exonerated themselves from every species of liability to persons who put goods on board their ships, had a tendency to cause recklessness not only on the part of the shipowners, but of the mariners themselves. That was in itself a source of danger, and, having had much to do professionally with that class of bills of lading, he had years ago warned shipowners and shipping companies that the day would come when the Government would interpose and put a stop to this practise of exonerating themselves from responsibility. He was glad the Government had had the courage to deal with the subject of bills of lading. As to valued policies, he thought the matter was too clear for argument, and he could not help thinking that his hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) must have prepared his observations with the idea that a Bill of a totally different kind was about to be introduced into the House. Indeed, his objections seemed altogether contradictory, for first of all, the hon. Member seemed to ignore the existence of such things as excessive insurances, and then he said that this Bill would be nugatory, for that the insurers would go to Austria, to Switzerland, to Italy, and elsewhere. What was the meaning of that, if the evil struck at by the clause in question did not exist? He (Mr. Williams) was under the impression, from what he had heard out-of-doors, that the Government was about to introduce a much more violent change in the law, but they seemed to him to have prudently abstained from going the length that some had urged them to do, and had presented to the House a moderate and useful measure. By the Bill valued policies were not forbidden; it was not said that assurers should not recover, but that if it should appear to the tribunal before which the question came to be tried that there were good grounds for believing that there had been an excessive and improper valuation, that tribunal should have the power, not of declaring the insurance to be illegal, but of causing an independent inquiry as to whether there had not been an abuse of this convenient practice, and the consequence would be that the insurer would only recover what amounted to an honest indemnity. He could not conceive any objection to that provision. No honest man would be injured by it. He might remind his hon. Friend that cases of excessive insurance might occur inadvertently, as, for example, the case of the Sir William Eyre, on which an insurance on a valued policy of £15,000 was effected. It was not known at the time to the assured or the underwriters that the ship was practically a wreck. She went on shore at New Zealand, and the injury the ship had received was so great that it had reduced her value so that she was not worth £1,500. She was destroyed by fire, and the assured sought to recover on the policy, not £1,500, but £15,000, and it was held that he was entitled to recover the larger sum. He never could see the sense of that, and he should hail with pleasure any law which would prevent the recovery of the amount insured under such circumstances. He congratulated the Government for the courage which they had shown in introducing that clause, and he hoped they would persevere with their Bill, which, as far his judgment went, was a moderate and useful measure.

Mr. E. J. REED said, he was of opinion that the Government in this measure had gone the shortest possible distance in the way of satisfying public expectation. When the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer first gave an intimation of his intention, it was expected that, in order to meet a great public demand, some limitation would be placed on the amount to be allowed to be insured—say three-fourths of the value. If any such limitation had been proposed, he should have objected to it, because he should have regarded it as an undue restriction upon trade and commerce. Every one free from prejudice who had listened to the right hon. Gentleman must have felt that, if he had erred at all, he had proposed a Bill which erred wholly on the side of moderation, and he regretted it did not go far enough in protecting the other classes concerned. He was sorry to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) threaten an opposition to the Bill on the part of the shipowners. The Government would, he feared, experience difficulties from not shaping their measure sufficiently in accordance with the other classes interested. For himself, he objected to hear the honourableness of shipowners so much insisted upon in that House. Parliament, in its legislation, did not assume dishonourableness in any particular class, and the House had no right to be told so often, and its time ought not to be taken up by so many assertions of the honour of the shipowning class, when legislation for that interest was rendered necessary by the conduct of some of them. But, as so much was said about the honour of the shipowners' class, he should take the liberty of mentioning a circumstance which did not speak well for the conduct of certain persons belonging to that body. Last year Parliament passed an Act to compel the shipowners to mark their vessels with a load-line. That was a moderate proposal; yet it was stated the other day by The Times that in one of the Northern ports the shipowners had marked the load-line in a manner, not only to evade the Act, but to bring legislation on the subject into ridicule or inoperativeness. There was an absence of want of proper feeling and a proper sense of honour on the part of certain of the representatives of that class. They were represented in that House by Gentlemen of eminence, and honour, and probity; but they ought to be free to discuss that question like any other, without having it assumed that in shaping their protective legislation they were attacking the honour of the class to be affected by it, and he hoped that in future debates they would hear a little less of it and a little more of sympathy for the other classes concerned. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech that evening, deprecated the bringing in of any measures on the Opposition side of the House having a tendency to injure the shipping interest.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I did not say that they were introduced with the intention of injuring the shipping interest, but that they might have that effect.

MR. E. J. REED said, that any measures of the kind alluded to were brought in and supported with the idea, not of injuring, but improving the shipping interest, and the House had heard at a most untimely moment the old threat that the effect would be to drive British trade from being carried on under the British flag. He believed it would be found, on the contrary, that the effect would be to protect and invite trade to stop under the British flag. He was glad the Foreign Office had received assurances from some of the most important of the Governments of Europe that they were quite disposed to go with us in our legislation for the protection of ships and sailors. He hoped that, so far from driving any ships from under the British flag, temperate and careful legislation of this kind would have an opposite effect. He hoped that the Government would not look too much to the shipowning interest of the House, while treating it with all due respect, but would remember that there were others in the country beside shipowners; and, in conclusion would say that, although the clauses of the Bill did not go so far as some might wish, he thought the honourable and moderate efforts of the Government to modify legislation in the direction of promoting the saving of life at sea could be effected without the least injury to any shipowner whatever.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, there were very few shipowners in the House, and of late very little attention had been paid to them when their interests were under discussion. In bringing the subject forward the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put things in the best light he could. It must be remembered that the Bill went in the direction of unsettling many important matters that had come to be understood; and, having once begun to do that, it would be difficult to know where to end. It would be an incessant annoyance to shipowners if they had to fight disputes with underwriters about value. Many of the shipping laws, like those of the British Constitution, had never been passed by Parliament. In legislating about insurance they would be dealing with men who were quite able to take care of themselves; but the attempt raised the question of all kinds of insurance, including, he submitted, fire and life, and went on the principle that a man could not properly judge for himself. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) was therefore surely justified in explaining the way in which the measure would affect him and the interest he represented, and he thought the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) had been a little hard on him. The tendency of the proposed legislation was to throw all the shipping interest into the hands of the great shipowners, and to place difficulties in the way of poor men who, perhaps, owned only one or two ships, and were trying to rise in the world, which would prevent the consummation of their desires.

MR. GOSCHEN, while admitting the propriety of the appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they should discuss the Bill as little as possible now, said, no one could complain that shipowners should rise and state their views, and he would appeal with confidence to the Committee to admit that shipowners need not shrink from stating their views with perfect frankness. Those who represented the land or other interests that were affected by legislation would be heard patiently on every point; and a like indulgence would be granted to shipowners. From inquiries he had made, he found that a large body of underwriters considered that they had no pecuniary interest in the settlement of the question, and they would not be disposed to offer any opposition to legislation which would not lead to litigation. What the underwriters feared more than anything else was the possibility of litigation, and they would desire to oppose the Bill only so far as the changes involved might lead to the hindrances arising from the unnecessary interference of the legal profession. There was one point which would be acceptable to underwriters, and that was the implied warranty which already existed in other cases. He hoped the Bill would be examined mainly with the object of seeing how far it accomplished the object at which it aimed, and whether it would lead to so much litigation as to make it unworkable. The main task of the Government would be to prove that their measure would be effectual, and that it could not be evaded, as it would probably be if it were not very precise. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood), for instance, had himself pointed out one danger which might possibly arise when he suggested that honour policies would supersede legal policies. He hoped the Bill would be examined carefully with a disposition to meet the Government, if it could be done without injury to the great interests involved, and with the certainty that saving of life would result from the changes proposed.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK thought that the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) was on the horns of a dilemma; either excessive valuation was frequent—which he himself did not believe—in which case some such Bill was surely necessary, or it was confined to rare cases of fraud, in which case the Bill would not affect honest shipowners; but, on the contrary, by diminishing marine risk, would tend to benefit them by lowering premiums. As chairman of a Marine Insurance Society, he was not afraid that this portion of the Bill would drive insurance abroad or to clubs, for clubs would not permit excessive overvaluation. It must be remembered that the Bill tended to assimilate the law of marine assurance to that of fire and life, in neither of which overvaluation was permitted. He had made inquiries of two of the principal fire offices as to the danger of litigation, and he was informed that there were very few cases of litigation arising out of overvaluation in fire insurances; still fire insurance offices would be sorry to alter the existing law, for the power of opening the question of valuation had in many instances led to the detection of gross frauds which would otherwise have been successful. He believed such would be the effect of the clause in the present Bill, and that shipowners, instead of being injured, would be benefited by the proposed measure. If fraud were stopped by the Bill the honest shipowner would be the gainer. As regarded the question of freight and the other clauses, the matter required careful consideration, but he could not but hope that on the whole the Bill would prove a valuable measure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thanked the Committee for the manner in which they had received the Bill, and said he could assure the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) that in what he said at the conclusion of his speech he had no wish to prevent hon. Gentlemen who were interested from making any remarks they pleased. What he was anxious for was that they should, in the first place, go on with the interesting subject which his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Charles Adderley) would have to bring forward, and also that hon. Gentlemen should not be in a hurry to commit themselves with regard to this Bill until they had had time to think it over, because he apprehended it was of a character somewhat different from that which many hon. Gentlemen might have expected. It would require some little consideration and study as to the way in which it would work before they could form an opinion of its effect, and how far it met the circumstances of the case. He was as anxious as the hon. Member for Hull that no prejudice should be raised, and that they should consider the Bill calmly and see how far it really would work. In reply to the remark of the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed), that he had said too much of shipowners and too little of another class, he desired to say that he was anxious to avoid raising anything like feeling in this matter, which it was desirable to consider calmly and carefully and without respect to classes; and he was also anxious to say, in reply to other remarks, that the measure was not brought forward in any spirit of hostility to shipowners. He was asked whether it would be effective, and he hoped it would, for it would give the sanction of an Act of Parliament to proper principles, which in this, as in other cases, was in itself a desirable object to accomplish.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Insurances and other Maritime Contracts.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL. Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 50.]

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in rising to move that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts, said, the Committee would recollect that he had introduced a Bill on the same subject, with the same title, last Session, which, unfortunately, was dropped; but he had the good fortune to retrieve some of its most important clauses in a short and temporary Act at the end of the Session. In one point of view he was not sorry that those important clauses were so temporarily passed, because an opportunity had thus been given of a six months' experiment to test whether they were wisely conceived and worked satisfactorily. It was now a gratification to his own mind to have to recommend to Parliament to make permanent all the provisions which were temporarily passed in the Act of last year, and which, with one exception, were all taken out of his original Bill; and he wished to show to the Committee that the experience of the last six months, though certainly only a short term, still afforded some test, and had been satisfactory. The Bill he asked leave now to introduce proposed to take up other clauses also of the dropped Bill, and to make two or three additions which he hoped the Committee would consider improvements. Before he described the provisions of the Bill in detail, he might, perhaps, dispose of one suggestion which had been freely and widely made—namely, that Parliament would do more wisely to proceed at once to the consolidation of all the Acts relating to Merchant Shipping. He thought he could adduce two valid reasons against adopting that suggestion. The first was that generally it was unwise to go on amending at the time of consolidating any portion of the law, because every amendment gave cause for further consolidation, and the process would become interminable. He therefore thought that in this case, as in all others, it was wiser to finish amending the law before proceeding to consolidate it. He had another reason—he thought this would be a most unpropitious time to attempt to consolidate the Merchant Shipping Acts; because there was certainly an amount of excitement in the public mind on the subject which would render it unfit to discuss all the details of something like 20 Acts of Parliament. A consolidating law would consist of at least 600 or 700 clauses;

and, in the present state of the public mind, it would be difficult to put up for discussion such a map of details without running the risk of appealing from decisions which Parliament had formed in calmer moments to the impulses of more exciting and less dispassionate times. He had himself attempted, in the Bill that was dropped last Session, to consolidate the discipline clauses of the Merchant Shipping Acts, but he certainly found by experience that it was not a wise attempt; and therefore he did not now propose to re-introduce that portion of the dropped Bill. They had spent the greater part of the time allowed in Committee in discussing the re-enactment of what was already on the Statute Book. He had thought it wise to avoid the repetition of such delay, and had confined the provisions of the Bill to the points most prominently before the public. The late Government had attempted to consolidate the Merchant Shipping Acts in three consecutive years, and their Bills for that purpose, introduced in 1869, 1870, and 1871, now to be found in the Library, certainly were a valuable repertory of information; but on every occasion they were brought forward without any legislative result. He thought the Members of the late Government would therefore agree with him in refraining from consolidating. When he spoke of the agitation of the public mind he did not wish to deprecate or depreciate the value of the agitation which had arisen on this subject. On the contrary, he thought that agitation had roused the attention of Parliament to very important purpose; but, at the same time, it must be borne in mind that a vast deal of exaggeration and misstatements of facts generally attended agitation, and this case would prove to be no exception to the general rule. He would indicate very briefly some heads upon which statements were greatly exaggerated — the deterioration of our merchant shipping; the disasters which were represented as increasingly happening; the deterioration of our seamen, and the greater amount of recklessness, disaster, and loss of life. The conclusion which must be arrived at after a careful examination of statistics of the highest authority was that British tonnage had trebled since 1835; that British ships clearing for foreign ports had sextupled in the same period; that the men employed in British ships in the trade of the United Kingdom had doubled in the last 20 years; and that British ships were not only absorbing the trade of the United Kingdom, but the best trade of other countries also, some of which was even falling off, and coming into the hands of British shipowners. Again, the wrecks since 1836 had steadily decreased in proportion to the number of voyages; and whereas for every life lost between 1832 and 1835 the tonnage was 4,600, for every life lost in the years 1870 to 1873 there were 13,000 tons employed in the foreign trade of the United Kingdom, so that the falling-off in the loss of life was the most remarkable part of these records. He thought it desirable to correct these misrepresentations and exaggerations, and he thought so for four different reasons. In the first place, for the credit of the country; secondly, in the very interests of the agitation itself, as such misstatements might render men sceptical as to the evil which did exist and which should be met; thirdly, because such misstatements and misrepresentations should make them doubly cautious lest they dealt under the influence of any panic with a subject of such vital importance as the shipping interest of this country; and fourthly, as the evil of recklessness which they had to deal with was so shown to be a very exceptional one in the general enterprize of the country, it was the duty of the Government strictly to confine itself to those exceptional cases, and not to attempt to take part in the general conduct of the enterprize, nor to render itself responsible in the place of the undertakers by prescribing the mode of conducting it. The main spirit of the Bill was to check reckless imperilling of life in the merchant sea-service of this country, and with this view to take steps simply as a matter of police for the public protection, but, at the same time, to refrain from harassing the whole Mercantile Marine by needless and even mischievous interference.

He would now proceed to describe the contents of the Bill. The first enacting clause laid down broadly the principle that any man who sent a ship to sea without taking reasonable precautions that it was sent in such a condition as not to endanger human life was guilty of a misdemeanour. That was the law at the present moment. By the first statute on the subject—the Act of 1854, Section 239—any master or seaman who, by neglect of duty, endangered life, was guilty of a misdemeanour. The Merchant Shipping Act of 1871 extended this liability to the owners of ships and to all persons having authority to send a ship to sea. The temporary Act of 1875 extended the liability still further; it not only made anyone, whether owner or other person, who sent, or attempted to send, or was party to sending a ship to sea in an unseaworthy state guilty of a misdemeanour, but also the master who took the ship to sea in that condition. It was a recommendation of the Royal Commission to extend the provision of 1871 to the master; and he introduced a clause to that effect in the dropped Bill. But the clause which he first drafted was largely extended by the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell), and was, in fact, now called “the Herschell Clause,” and had the advantage of his high authority, though it was so extended with his own full concurrence. It was, however, open for the owner to show that he had taken reasonable means to insure the safety of his ship. He had observed that in a discussion on the subject the Shipowners’ Association considered this provision as a hardship upon the owner, and not in the spirit of the English law. But they entirely misunderstood the object of the provision, for it was not against, but in favour of, the shipowner that the permission of exculpation was offered. When it had been proved that a ship had been taken to sea in an unseaworthy state, there was a prima facie case against the owner; but this provision gave him an opportunity of showing in exculpation that he had taken all reasonable precautions; and as it would be impossible for the prosecutor to prove a negative, or that he had not taken reasonable precautions, this was the shipowner’s proper defence. That clause put the owner of a ship and all engaged very much in the position of other carriers. When an accident occurred on a railway it was usual to prosecute the company’s servants for manslaughter through whose fault a loss of life was occasioned, and it was for them to avoid the charge by showing that they had taken all reasonable care. A very important provision in this clause was the registering a managing owner in every British ship, so that there should always be some one under the obligations, and subject to the liabilities of ownership in the Act. There were no successful prosecutions under the 239th section of the Act of 1854, and under the Act of 1871 he believed there were only two. But the Board of Trade had now, under the Act of 1875, a very efficient Law Officer, by whose assistance the law had been more actively put in force than before; and although he (Sir Charles Adderley) could not say, as but a short time had elapsed, that there had yet been a completely successful prosecution under it, yet he believed the indirect operation of the law had been very effective.

The next subject with which the Bill dealt was the obligation of a shipowner to his crew—that he or his agents should take all reasonable precautions to make and to keep the ship in a seaworthy state. This was one of the clauses of the dropped Bill of 1875. Before the Act of 1875 the Common Law bound a shipowner to his crew as a master to his servant—that he would take due care, especially in dangerous employment, to have his machinery in safe condition. But there was no warranty of safety; and in the ruling case on this subject, “Couch v. Steel,” it was decided in 1854 that seamen could get no damages for injury from unseaworthiness. It was found that there was a statutory obligation to find medicines, but not a safe ship. It was the opinion of the Law Officers in 1855 that a seaman could refuse to sail on the ground of the unseaworthiness of the ship; but when once he had sailed there was no redress for damage in the voyage. The Act of 1871, with a view to amend that unsatisfactory state of the law, allowed to the seaman as a plea in defending himself against a charge of desertion, that the ship was unseaworthy; but in order to get the benefit of the provision he had first to desert. It also gave seamen a right of inquiry by the Board of Trade if a fourth of the crew complained. The clause which he proposed to introduce adopted Section 9 of the temporary Act of 1875, which gave the seaman a civil remedy for injury sustained by the unseaworthiness of a ship, thus imposing on the owner an obligation to the crew out of which he could not contract himself. It brought the seaman within the operation of Lord Campbell’s

Sir Charles Adderley

Act; if he lost his life his widow had a claim, but the owner's liability was kept, as heretofore, limited. As to the detention of unseaworthy ships, the Bill next proposed to embody the provisions of the Act of 1873 for the surveying of ships, but substituted an easier and more expeditious Court of Appeal against the judgments of surveyors; and with the provisions of the Act of 1873 it embodied those of the temporary Act of last year for appointing district officers to whom the Board of Trade delegated their powers of detention. The process of detention under the existing law was this: Whenever there was any complaint made to the Board of Trade that a ship was unseaworthy, or when the Board of Trade had reason to think that a ship was going to sea in that condition, they might send a provisional order for her detention and an officer to survey and report. Upon receiving that report the Board of Trade could send a final order for the ship's detention until the conditions of the order were fulfilled. There was now an appeal to the local Admiralty Court—that was, the County Court. It was proposed that an easier appeal should be given to the shipowners against the judgment of surveyors. The Bill substituted for the County Court a Court of Survey, consisting of a Judge and two assessors, one the nominee of the Board of Trade, the other of the Local Marine Board or Association of Shipowners. To this Court shipowners might appeal in the case of any charge of overloading, and even before appealing they might require the Board of Trade surveyor to take an assessor with him, and settle the point at once. In more serious cases of unseaworthiness the appeal was to be only against the final order. If a Board of Trade surveyor refused to certify to the safety of a passenger or emigrant ship, the same Court was open to the shipowners' appeal; and if a point of science or an important principle were involved, either the Board of Trade or the shipowner might refer it to scientific referees appointed by the Court of Appeal. The Judge of the Court of Survey would be either a stipendiary magistrate or one of a list of fit persons stated in the Bill; while one of the assessors would be a persons of nautical, engineering, or other special skill and experience. These provisions, he hoped, would fairly meet the wishes of the shipowners for a more easy and satisfactory Court of Appeal and the just demands of the case. The clause also made permanent the provisions in the temporary Act of last year as to officers to whom might be delegated the powers of the Board of Trade in case of emergency. Upon this point he would state what he had done in execution of the first section of the Act of 1875 under which he had to make these appointments. After Parliament was prorogued, he sent the chief professional adviser of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, Captain Murray, to make a circuit of the districts throughout the whole Kingdom and report as to the condition of the Survey staff. Captain Murray's Report, which had been laid on the Table, showed the necessity of an entire re-organization of the staff. The fact was that the Survey staff of the Board of Trade had from time to time, by numerous Acts of Parliament, had so many and such difficult and complicated duties thrown upon them that they were no longer adequate, either in number or qualification, for the discharge of all these duties. They had to inspect ships, survey ships both as to their loading, equipment, and machinery, examine officers for certificates, record the draft of water, and attend to tonnage measurement. These numerous and onerous duties were imposed upon a limited number of surveyors, receiving, he must say, rather inadequate pay. Shipowners might also, with some justice, ask for a higher class of officers to deal with more important questions and to superintend the ordinary staff, so as to insure greater order in their action, and, what was of more importance, greater uniformity of judgment. With this view, following Captain Murray's Report, he had made a consultative staff in London, besides the district Survey staff; he had put principal officers over 10 districts, which embraced the whole coast of the United Kingdom; and these officers would superintend the whole staff of their respective districts. He had also given authority, under the Act of 1875, to some existing officers to detain ships on the part of the Board of Trade, and subject to their sanction; and he had also weeded out what might be called the ineffectives of the staff, and placed efficient men in their stead. On the whole, he thought he had fully carried out the intentions of Parliament, expressed in Section 1 of the temporary Act of 1875; and he had the gratification of knowing that what he had done was thought satisfactory in the different districts where the principal officers had been placed. The reports already made by these officers showed, too, that great benefit had already ensued, and there had already in consequence been less overloading; and that by the presence of these officers on the spot many questions had been settled by amicable correspondence instead of by dilatory reference to the Board of Trade, while they had given material assistance in carrying out the objects of Parliament last year.

Next he came to the question of grain cargoes. Immediately after the passing of the Act of 1875 the Foreign Office sent a copy of the Act to all our Consuls at grain-exporting ports, and told them to report upon any violations of Section 3 in the Act of 1875. Here he might frankly say, for he had no wish to detract from the credit due to the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plim-soll), that it was owing very much to his exertions in the Black Sea that the Board of Trade took the steps they did. The Board telegraphed to our Consuls to do what they could to carry out the Foreign Office order, employing fit persons to go on board ship, with power to incur expenses to the amount of £2 per ship. There could be no doubt that the hon. Member did great service in visiting the grain ships, giving information as to the Act, and offering advice. But, at the same time, the hon. Member would probably acknowledge that a Government could not do exactly the same thing which could be done by a private individual in a matter of this kind. The hon. Member's name naturally carried great weight on this subject, and his advice was readily taken. But a Government officer was not received in the same way. His advice was in the nature of a Government order, which, unless he had some means of enforcing it, would perhaps be better omitted altogether. Much, therefore, of the private action of the hon. Member was more effectual than the action of the Government, which had rather followed his suggestions and in his wake. All, however, that the Board of Trade could do was done. The telegrams to our Consuls to take these steps were immediately followed by a circular of instructions, with orders to report home monthly, and in special cases to report immediately, and at the same time to call the master's or the agent's attention to any violation of the Act. In December the Board of Trade sent out a second circular of instructions to all Consuls, Vice Consuls, and Agents, empowering a selected list of them to employ persons to inspect, and they were told to send home reports of all British ships loading or unloading grain at their respective ports. The Baltic, Black Sea, and American ports comprise seven-eighths of the grain-loading ports, and in many of these ports vessels loaded under local regulations, or under the strict supervision of the Government or of underwriters. From such ports, therefore, reports were not required. Instructions were also given to all Board of Trade Surveyors at home to inspect grain ships arriving with any "list" or appearance of improper loading, and to enforce penalties where the Act had been violated.

The next clause related to deck cargoes. This was a very difficult subject to deal with. The Committee must bear in mind that already in the eye of the law deck-loading was in itself prima facie evidence of unseaworthiness; it was cargo in an improper place, impeding navigation and causing danger. Goods on deck were not covered by a general insurance of goods, unless there was a special trade usage; and they gave no claim to contribution if jettisoned, though they were made to contribute to general average. The Customs Act of 1862 abolished the prohibition of deck-cargoes of timber, not only because the prohibition had proved impracticable—a sufficient reason in itself—but because the attempts to carry it out were mischievous. Some things must be carried on deck, since they could not be carried anywhere else. The law ought to check in every possible way such deck cargoes as need not necessarily be carried on deck; and, at all events, the law ought not to give a premium for that kind of loading, as it did at present, inasmuch as deck cargo was the only kind of cargo which did not pay tonnage dues. Various proposals had been made for checking unnecessary deck cargoes. The first proposition was to prohibit them altogether. Among the Notices of Amendments to the dropped Bill of last year was one to prohibit the discharge of all cargoes as might be so imported, and to prevent them from being landed. In his judgment such a proposal could hardly be supported by Parliament. Suppose a deck cargo brought safely across the Atlantic, and, to the delight of eager customers, arrived safely at an English port, it would be absurd to say—"By all the rules of the sea you ought to have gone to the bottom, and you must put out to sea again to ascertain whether you will not go to the bottom." The second proposal was that no vessel should go to sea with a deck cargo without a licence from the Board of Trade. Now, although he had the highest respect for that Department, he could hardly expect that Parliament would give it power to grant such licences. The third proposal was that extra port-dues should be levied on deck-loaded ships generally; but then these dues would be levied equally on all deck-loads of whatever kind they might be, and the rule would apply very unequally in different cases. For his own part, he was in hopes that the Bill proposed a mode of dealing with the difficulty that would prove satisfactory to the House. It was intended specifically to exempt some cargoes from prohibition—such as cattle, meat, and several things which must be carried on deck; but with regard to unexempted cargoes carried on deck, or in any space not included in tonnage measurement, such space would be measured into tonnage measurement and uncovered cargo on the open deck would be measured by its area and the rectangle of its bulk. This, he thought, was a very feasible plan, and would provide an effective check on deck cargoes, or, at least deprive them of their present unfair advantage, while at the same time it would not do more than was in itself reasonable. The proposal was free from all the objections applicable to the plans he had just alluded to. It would give no offence to foreign nations—it would not lead to evasive awning decks—it would carry out the fair principle that all cargo bearing space should pay. He was told by the men most acquainted with the subject that no difficulty or delay whatever would arise, for a ship coming in with a deck cargo would be met as usual by a Customs officer, who would measure that portion of her cargo which was so carried on the way into port.

Coasters, however, would not be included in this provision. It was also proposed to insert the deck-cargo clause of the dropped Bill. That was merely a precautionary clause; but it had had considerable effect as a caution. It rendered it imperative on every owner of a ship which cleared with a deck cargo to insert in the log both the quantity and quality of the cargo carried. This would be of great importance to him in case of any question arising as to casualty.

The next clauses of the Bill related to the load-line, which, as the House was well aware, was one of the most difficult and most vexed questions connected with the Merchant Shipping Laws. The present Bill would make permanent the 5th and 6th sections of the temporary Act of 1875. The reports he had received from all parts of England with regard to the enacted load-line were satisfactory, with the sole exception of Liverpool, where, at all events at first, some attempts were made to render the provisions of the Act ridiculous, if not nugatory, by fixing the load-line absurdly high. But, after a little reflection, the shipowners found it was not quite such a trifle as they had imagined. In the first place, the load-line by the words of the Act indicated the point up to which the owner intended to load, and, consequently, if the vessel were lost he would have to prove to the underwriters that he had not really loaded the ship up to that point—for the underwriters, of course, had a right to assume he had done so. Again, in the agreement with the crew it was a very important check, as it gave them a right, which they would not otherwise possess, to make claims and remonstrances. Besides, for marking so as to mislead there was a penalty of £100, which might be repeated any number of times. Consequently, it had been found at Liverpool that the matter was serious, and practical, and evasive load-lines had been changed. At the same time, he was anxious that there should be as little as possible of uncertainty or arbitrariness in the judgments of the Board of Trade surveyors as to the overloading of ships. He wished, therefore, to ascertain whether any general rules could be laid down by way of instructions to surveyors, so as to render their judgments about overloading as far as possible generally intelligible and uniform. For the purpose of procuring the best opinion on the subject he had invited a committee of 12 persons, of whom four were from Lloyd's, four from Liverpool Lloyd's, and four from the Board of Trade, as the best judges, to decide whether any such general rules and principles could be laid down. They debated the subject for two days, and on the third day they separated without being able to come to an agreement. It might be concluded, then, that such general rules were impossible. Every ship, every voyage, every cargo, and every season made the load-line a matter of utter uncertainty. Under these circumstances, he simply proposed to incorporate in the present Bill the load-line section of the temporary Act.

He would next advert to the system of wreck inquiries by the Board of Trade. Objection had been made to the mode of such inquiries because, though they were really intended to be principally useful for eliciting the circumstances of a casualty, they took the character of a criminal proceeding against the captain. In an inquiry into the cause of a wreck it was of the greatest possible importance that all the information that was procurable should be forthcoming, and it must tend to vitiate the inquiry if the evidence of the captain, not to criminate himself, were excluded. It was also objected to the present system that, under it, masters of vessels were brought before Police Courts. The dropped Bill of last Session endeavoured to meet this objection by restricting the inquiry to an inquest, leaving anything in the nature of criminal proceedings to the Courts of Law. All question as to the officer's certificate would thus be decided separately elsewhere. But any endeavour in that way would only render another inquiry necessary to investigate the competency of the master to hold his certificate. However restricted the first inquest might be, the master would have before him the fear of afterwards losing his certificate, and his evidence would be just as much impeded as if the two inquiries remained as now in one. The Bill, therefore, gave up all attempt to divest the inquiry of so far a criminal character, as to involve the competency of the master to retain his certificate. The Bill proposed to take up a suggestion of the Royal Commissioners by the appointment of a superior class of Judges to conduct the inquiries, to be called Wreck Commissioners—three in number, of whom one only would at first be appointed to preside over the largest—namely, that of London. The existing tribunals would continue with this addition. The last important wreck which had occurred—that of the Deutschland—showed the importance and illustrated the usefulness of such a step. It was most important that an inquiry should take place quickly, and before the very best authorities; but it turned out that there was no police-court in London which was ready to undertake such an inquiry. A letter was received by the Board of Trade from Sir Thomas Henry, to the effect that it was utterly impossible from the enormous amount of work he had to dispose of to undertake it; and in that letter, which would be laid before the House, he gave extremely good reasons why in such cases not only time but special qualifications were necessary to render the inquiry complete and satisfactory. Under these circumstances, the Board of Trade commissioned Mr. Rothery, Registrar of the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Judicature, and he undertook the inquiry as an Inspector of the Board of Trade under the Act of 1854. He believed that anyone who had followed the proceedings would agree with him that the inquiry was in all respects a full and satisfactory one. While it was so, it nevertheless afforded evidence of the fact that the difficulty as to placing the captain in the position of a defendant could not by any means be avoided. It would, he thought, be found that the Wreck Commissioners, if agreed to, would be a superior and better-qualified class of judges than now existed for the purpose in view. The Bill also proposed that the Wreck Commissioners should be allowed to take depositions in the same manner as the Receivers of Wrecks now did. By such means it was very probable that a great improvement would be effected by the fact that such depositions so taken would gradually supersede the protests now made before notaries.

Two clauses only remained for him to touch upon, and one related to the subject of training ships. He need say nothing to enforce the view that if they could get well-trained and well-disciplined boys to supply the Merchant Marine with better crews they would do more for the safety of ships and for the abolition of the reign of crimps than any Act of Parliament could effect. The Government could not undertake the charge of schools for that purpose. That was impossible. Fortunately, however, there were a great number of persons in the Kingdom who were ready to do so, and the number happily was increasing. It should be remembered, however, that in the existing state of things most of the school ships were filled by boys who had been committed by the magistrates under the Reformatory or Industrial Schools Act, and thus only public aid was given for the supply of merchant ship-crews by training boys of the worst class, and premiums were given out of public funds to the employment of such boys in preference to boys of respectable parents, who would supply merchant crews of the best materials. He knew it was very easy to show objections to grants of public money for the purpose of training the independent poor in any kind of industry, and that such a system would be open to the grossest abuse. Still, he thought that aid could safely be given from special funds to existing training-ships, and to new training-ships which he hoped to see established in all parts of the Kingdom, to enable them to train boys of respectable parents for the merchant sea-service. What the Bill proposed on this subject was to authorize grants out of any surplus of the Shipping Office fees—which surplus they might expect to become greater than now—in aid of school ships training boys of respectable parents who had not been committed by a magistrate, and who when turned out from training and obtaining employment in a merchant ship passed an efficient examination. He had hoped to get a larger sum out of which to make such grants by shipowners assenting to a special fee—say of 3*d.* a ton—on engaging crews; but he had not met with sufficient encouragement to justify him in making the proposal. He trusted, however, that the small beginning he might be able to make would if successful and found practically useful, lead to greater results in the future. The proposal would be greatly supplemented by what had been done by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, who had made an offer on the part of the Admiralty to such boys so trained, and who entered the third class boy Naval Reserve, by which they would have certain payments, a dress every year, and the prospect of a pension, and that he could not but think would have great effect in holding them permanently to the service.

He now came to the last clause, which proposed something in the way of a certificate of health to be procured by seamen on their engagement. There was no greater source of danger to ships than the diseased and rotten state in which seamen joined their vessels on starting. He had heard of a number of cases occurring on the Thames, the Mersey, and other rivers, of ships having to be taken to the sea by foreigners, owing to the drunken and diseased condition of the British sailors on board. A large number of such seamen were left abroad diseased, and the expense of bringing them home was a charge upon the taxpayer of this country, now amounting to about £30,000 a-year. It would be of great importance, then, in every point of view, that steps should be taken with a view to secure that this advantage to shipowners of throwing a diseased crew on the support of the country, should be allowed only when they had taken the little trouble to see to their being first engaged in a healthy state. Medical officers were employed at public expense to enable them to do so—paying only a fee of 1*s.* per man. He proposed, therefore, that unless the captain had taken the slight trouble of obtaining a certificate of the fitness of his crew for service, the cost of bringing his sick men back should be charged not to the taxpayer, but to the owners of the ship. Having avoided many of the topics that occupied so much of their attention last year, and which were better suited to a consolidating than to an amending Bill, he trusted that they had in the present Bill of 32 clauses fairly and carefully attempted to meet all the points in which the public were chiefly interested at the present time. Many who were personally interested in this question in this House had met the subject in a patriotic spirit, and had endeavoured to carry out, even at considerable sacrifice to themselves, what the public interests required. He could not but think that those who represented the demands of the public were also inclined to put forward those demands in a conciliatory spirit, and divest them of anything like hostility to the great shipowning interests. He therefore felt confident that this Bill would be passed, and that when passed it would meet the objects which the public had in view. If the Bill should pass he could promise that the Board of Trade would vigorously, faithfully, and carefully carry out its provisions. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Mr. GOURLEY, whilst congratulating the right hon. Gentleman on the clearness and simplicity which characterized his statement, regretted that he had not introduced a Bill to simplify and consolidate existing laws. He thought the proposals contained in the Bill so simple that very little time need be occupied in passing the measure as it stood. At the same time, he could not regard the proposal as altogether satisfactory, in that it did not fix any one with the responsibility of determining the load-line. This responsibility ought, in his view of the subject, to be undertaken by the Government, in order to satisfy the public mind on the question. It was proposed that the grain-loading clauses should be left as they were last year; but he adhered to his own opinion that the only way of dealing with the matter was to provide that one-fourth of the cargo should be stowed in bags and loaded on the top of the bulk. As to deck cargoes, he failed to see why one portion of the cargo should be exempt from tonnage dues whilst another was liable to them. Some information was required as to what the right hon. Gentleman had done during the Recess with respect to foreign Governments. If restrictions were to be placed upon deck-loading in British vessels they ought also, by international agreement, to be imposed in the case of foreign ships. The Court of Survey proposed to be constituted was an improvement upon the plan contained in the Bill of last year; but he could not say the same with regard to the training-ship scheme, unless the Government was prepared to undertake the sole responsibility of establishing such ships at the expense of the country, and so providing for the merchant service the improved class of seamen which was so much required. On the whole, there were many objections to various clauses in the Bill; but he should reserve himself for their discussion during its future progress, and especially when it went into Committee.

Mr. PLIMSOLL said, he did not propose to offer any general opinion on the subject of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman until he had had the opportunity of reading it and considering it carefully; because, although the statement which they had heard was lamentably short of what would be necessary as a satisfactory solution of the question, he was conscious of the great advantage of the Government taking up the measure, and of the possibility of improving it in Committee. He should meet the Bill with every disposition to see an opportunity of amending it rather than of embarrassing the Government and seeking to keep open the question a day longer than was absolutely necessary. He would like, however, to make one or two remarks upon some of the principal points. He had been very much struck, on the subject of the survey of vessels, with the complaint on the part of shipowners that the onus of proof was thrown upon them, that the vessels which had been lost started in a thoroughly seaworthy condition. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Adderley) contended that this was a mistaken view of their position. Because nothing could be proved, inasmuch as anybody who could tell anything was at the bottom of the sea. The difficulty of proving a negative was so great that he saw no reason why they should regard the position as unfavourable to them. The right hon. Gentleman had taken much credit for the fact that an efficient Law Officer had been appointed to see that the provisions of the Act of last Session were carried out, although he admitted that there had been no conviction under the Act. Surely if that efficient officer had done his duty he might have discovered in some out of the 500 or 600 cases in which the Board of Trade had stopped ships which were proved to be unseaworthy, sufficient evidence to have convicted the shipowners of an intention to send an unseaworthy ship to sea. He saw no reason why ships should not be placed on the same footing with factories, mines, and mills, and properly qualified persons sent to inspect them, armed with authority to require all necessary conditions to be complied with. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to leave the subject of grain cargoes as it was left last Session, and he added that the Board of Trade issued instructions to its agents on this point. He (Mr. Plimsoll) had seen those instructions, and they warned the agents that they were not to interfere in any way. That was the only trace he could find of any instruction in the Circular. Whilst he felt thankful that duly qualified officers were authorized to go on board ships, they were indebted for that to the Foreign Office, for the Board of Trade gave him a curt refusal to make any such arrangement, and it was only when Lord Derby was referred to that the thing was granted. With regard to deck cargoes, the right hon. Gentleman had said that the legislation that existed before 1862 prohibiting deck cargoes had been absolutely nugatory. He (Mr. Plimsoll) was astonished to hear that statement, because one expected a Minister of the Crown to inform himself on these points. A Circular was issued by the Board of Trade itself to Lloyd's in 1874, asking for information on this very subject. Lloyd's employed two gentlemen of great ability—namely, Messrs. Janson and Wakefield—who examined the records of over 6,800 voyages of timber-loaded ships for 10 years during which deck-loading was prohibited, and for the 10 years after the prohibition was removed in 1862, and they reported to Lloyds, who, he presumed, reported to the Board of Trade, that the loss of life since 1862 was vastly greater than when the deckloading was prohibited. The evidence was most conclusive on the point, though at the moment he forgot the figures. The right hon. Gentleman made himself a little merry at his (Mr. Plimsoll's) expense, because he desired to prevent deck-loaded timber ships from entering British ports, and had asked whether such ships were to be sent out to sea again to be lost. He, however, was not to be deterred from carrying out his object by ridicule of that character. Of course such ships were not to be sent out to sea again to be lost; but heavy penalties might be imposed upon all such ships which entered our ports, and the effect in time would be to prevent them being sent here. That legislation of that kind if properly enforced would be successful, had been proved by the Indian Government, who had imposed heavy penalties on all over-crowded and ill-found vessels which brought home the pilgrims returning from Jaffa, and had thus put an end to the evils sought to be repressed. The right hon. Gentleman had expressed himself satisfied with the legislation of last year as to the load-line; but upon that point he should be prepared to join issue with him in Committee; because one of the right hon. Gentleman's own supporters had said, with regard to many of the ships sailing from the port he belonged to, that the load-line might just as well be put upon the funnel as where it was placed under last year's statute. Shipowners who placed a very fair load-line on their ships in our ports buried that line completely when they got into the Black Sea, and thus it became utterly valueless. In the present Act there was no penalty for submerging the load-line, such as it was. The right hon. Gentleman also described how he had got 12 representative gentlemen to try to devise some general scheme by which it might be decided when a ship was overloaded, and they had failed. No doubt they would fail, because the problem he set them was the wrong problem. The question was not how to get a general ruling, for such a thing could not be devised, but—"Can you, or any two of you, on any ship submitted to you, find a safe load-line for that ship?" The Bristol Chamber of Commerce had recently passed a sensible resolution on this point; but the only method of determining what was a fair load-line was by considering each individual case. No general principle could be applied to these matters. But there would be no difficulty whatever in experts dealing with each case, and the load-line already in operation would greatly facilitate their labours if such a commission of experts should be appointed. The Board of Customs were already in possession of the lines of each ship; and if the Government were desirous of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion he should recommend them to get the 12 gentlemen to go through the returns made by the shipowners, and where they found that an ample free board had been allowed put those ships aside and deal with the remainder one by one. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the inquiries with regard to lost ships generally became inquiries, not into the seaworthiness of the ship, but into the guilt or innocence of the captain. That was precisely what he (Mr. Plimsoll) said last Session, for which he got into dreadful hot water at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. What he said would be found in the debates as well as the manner in which his remarks were received. Undoubtedly it was the case that these inquiries resolved themselves into the guilt or innocence of the captain and not the seaworthiness or otherwise of the ship. It was unnecessary that he should disclaim all intention of libelling all shipowners; but the right hon. Gentleman had given an illustration of the abnormal position into which this great and important question had drifted when he informed the House that ships were frequently taken down the river by foreign crews until the drunken and diseased English sailors were put on board of them. Why, he asked, were shipowners treated entirely different from other employers? Suppose the railway company had said in respect to the Abbots Ripton collision—"Oh, the engine-driver was drunk and the stoker was drunk," and had urged that as an excuse, would not the public say—"It is your business to provide sober men?" Why should the shipowner be relieved from responsibility for the acts of their servants? Why should shipowners not inquire into the character of their servants, and see the sort of people they were engaging? If a drunken crew were put on board at the last moment, who was to blame—the men, who were helpless, or the sober men who sent them to sea in that condition? He did not see why shipowners should not be held responsible, like any other class of employers, for the people they employed. He must now repeat what he said at the outset, that when he found, although the clauses of the Bill were apparently unsatisfactory, that there were clauses dealing with survey, deck cargoes, load-line, and grain cargoes, he thought that even if the Bill might not be such as the House and the country would accept as it stood, yet it would afford a framework which the House in Committee might fill up with some very good and useful legislation. While reciprocating the kind expressions used towards himself, he hoped the Government would approach the subject with a disposition to accept the opinion of the House in the matter. He trusted the decision on each separate issue as it arose in the hands of the House, confident that so far as the House could accomplish it, they would have good and useful legislation on the subject.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the failure of last Session was to be attributed mainly to the fact that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman had not precedence over the Bills of his Colleagues; it was postponed to almost every Bill of his Colleagues. But even when the House finally got into Committee upon it the House would recollect that the measure had hardly been properly considered by the Cabinet itself, and the right hon. Gentleman did not receive from the Prime Minister the support which might have been expected. The House might hope that these mistakes would not be repeated this year, that this Bill would be properly considered, and that full opportunity would be given for the discussion, not only of its clauses, but also of the very important Amendments which would probably be proposed by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll). He regretted to hear what the President of the Board of Trade had said with respect to the question of consolidation. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) thought a Consolidation Bill ought to follow this Bill immediately. The President of the Board of Trade seemed to think that there could be no consolidation, because there was too much excitement in the mind of the public on the subject; but without some interest in the public mind it would be impossible at any time to carry a Consolidation Bill. Therefore, he could not but think that, considering the somewhat meagre programme which the Cabinet had laid before Parliament, it would be possible to carry not only this Bill, but also a Consolidation Bill which would reduce to something like order the great chaos in which all shipping questions were now. He must admit that from all the information he had received with respect to the appointments made during the Recess under the measure of last Session, they were judicious and good ones. He was quite certain that one appointment made by the right hon. Gentleman, or rather by the Prime Minister—namely, that of the hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) to the Board of Trade—had been received with great satisfaction by the House, and he might say by the country. He did not propose on the present occasion to go through the many details stated by the right hon. Gentleman; but there was one point on which he must say a few words. The House would recollect that last Session the right hon. Gentleman proposed in his Bill that a sum out of the Mercantile Marine Fund should be applied to the training of boys for the Merchant Service. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman would lay on the Table any scheme under which that money would be laid out in the training of boys for ships. Last Session the right hon. Gentleman, he believed, was unable to give the House any scheme, for the best of reasons—because he had no scheme at all. [Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY dissented.] At all events, the right hon. Gentleman was not able to give it to the House. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would tell the House what sum of money he would contribute towards the training of boys, and subject to what conditions. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal involved, directly or indirectly, the taxation of shipowners, and they were entitled, he thought, to know on what conditions this money would be spent. As to the other details of the Bill, they would be better discussed on the second reading.

MR. E. J. REED admitted that the Bill went further than he had anticipated, and he was glad that it did so. It proposed to legislate on three out of the four important points which had been under deliberation last year. It did not deal with the question of load-line as the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) would wish; but he (Mr. E. J. Reed) apprehended that the object of legislation was not to embody the views simply of one particular individual, but to legislate for the general satisfaction. What was wanted was that the Government should show they were disposed to go as far as the country desired them to go, and that had certainly been done in this instance. But though it did that, he himself was of opinion it might have been better had the Government gone further. For himself, he believed that a survey of ships by the Government was perfectly practicable. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Derby that the load-line proposals were unsatisfactory. That subject, it ought to be borne in mind, was full of difficulty, and the right hon. Gentleman had shown that the owner's load-line had many beneficial indirect effects. With regard to the question of deck cargo, as with regard to the question of a load-line, he thought that the proposal of the Government was an extremely well-considered one; but he doubted if it would be found to be a final one; or that it was all that the Government could fairly be asked to prescribe. He believed that the Bill was a very fair proposal as a whole, and that, both in what it did and what it admitted of being done in Committee, it put before the House a measure which they might well receive with satisfaction and thankfulness.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. RAIKES, Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, and Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 49.]

RESOLUTION.

MR. HEYGATE moved—

"That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past Twelve of the clock at night with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called."

MR. CHADWICK wished to enter his protest against the Resolution, on the ground that he had often seen the Order which it involved used to impede important Motions of independent Members of the House. If it were only a question as to no new Business being introduced after half-past 12 o'clock, for which the late Mr. Brotherton so long contended, he should heartily support the Resolution.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for facilitating the Regulation and Improvement of Commons, and for the amendment of the Inclosure Acts, said, that no one could have read or looked at the Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for the last year without being struck with the very great number of inclosure schemes, passed by the Commissioners, which had been silently waiting for their confirmation by Parliament. For years past Parliament had practically come to the conclusion, without an absolute vote, that it would not confirm any further schemes of that kind until the law regulating the inclosure of commons had been, to some extent, revised; and also that it would not undertake the revision of the law on that subject until it had had laid before it as accurate an account as could be obtained of the quantity of land which yet remained uninclosed, pointing out how much of it could be cultivated and how much could not, together with certain other particulars respecting those lands. All those particulars were now before the House, and he thought it was quite time that an end should be put to that which had become a disgrace to the legislation of this country—namely, that there should be a law passed for the inclosure of commons, and that people should go to a certain expense to have their lands inclosed, and should then find it practically impossible to get their schemes confirmed. Therefore, he thought that the House would probably be of the same opinion as the Government—namely, that the period had arrived when that question should be undertaken, and in a somewhat broad and comprehensive spirit, so as once for all to put the matter on such a foundation as it might rest upon, they hoped, for a long term of years. The Report they had had placed before them as to the extent of land which still remained uninclosed, and otherwise was most interesting. He found that the total amount of that land was about 2,632,000 acres, of which about 883,000 acres were apparently capable of being brought into cultivation; while nearly 1,500,000 acres were unsuited for cultivation, and about 250,000 acres might be called common field land. Now, what had really been the reason why Parliament had held its hand in confirming inclosure schemes of late years? It was briefly this. They had not been satisfied that sufficient compensation had been given to those who had admittedly no proprietary rights over the commons, but who, nevertheless, practically incurred a loss by the fact of the commons being inclosed. Out of 587,000 acres inclosed since the passing of the Inclosure Acts, only something like 4,000 acres had been made into allotments for gardens, recreation grounds, &c., although about 414,000 were available for that purpose; and this he believed was one of the main causes which had brought the operation of the Inclosure Acts into some disfavour, and had led to public opinion demanding the revision of those Acts. He was not going to trouble the House with a discussion of the ancient laws relating to commons; but he thought it right to call attention to the origin of some of the first Inclosure Acts which had been passed. Up to 1845 no inclosures occurred without the sanction of Parliament, except by private Acts; but towards the end of last century Select Committees were appointed to consider the inclosure question. In 1801 the Inclosure Clauses Consolidation Act was passed, the object of which was in the first place to increase the supply of food for the people, the extent of uncultivated land being very great compared with the population; and, secondly, to furnish employment for the soldiers returning from the war of that time. So matters went on until 1845, when, after considerable inquiry, a general Inclosure Act came into law. This Act was intended to facilitate the inclosure of lands by the great saving of expense effected by public instead of private Acts, and by having inquiries conducted locally instead of by Committees of the House, which was more convenient for those whose interests were concerned. Still, there was no doubt the object of the Act of 1845 was, in the main, the increase of the food of the people; and the Commissioners, he believed, had done their duty most faithfully and honestly according to the intentions of the Parliament of that day. The Act of 1845, however, did not recognize any right of the public at large to the commons, which were practically the property of private persons, and no legal decision had ever been given to that effect. But the Act contained certain provisions in order to secure for the public some compensation for the loss of the enjoyment which they individually suffered by the commons being inclosed. Provision was also made for the allotment of gardens, recreation grounds,

&c. Under this Act, inclosures went on to a large extent; but, as he had said, out of 414,000 acres subject to allotment, rather less than 4,000 acres had been allotted. Circumstances had, no doubt, greatly altered since the passing of the Inclosure Act of 1801, and even that of 1845. The feeling of the country had changed on the subject, and the reason for it was not difficult to find. In the first place, the necessity for increasing the food supply of the people by the cultivation of commons was not by any means so pressing as formerly. Indeed, the amount of food that could be supplied by the commons if put under cultivation would be but as a drop in the ocean compared with the supplies that now came from abroad. Then the general increase of the population was so large that in discussing the expediency of inclosing lands they had to consider, not merely how to increase the food supply, but what was really best calculated to promote the health and material prosperity of the people of this country. Whatever could be done in this way without interfering with private rights, it was their duty to do; and the question of commons, viewed in this light, was perhaps of even greater importance now than it was in 1801 and 1845. But it was worth while to consider whether there was no other reason than that he had mentioned for the disfavour into which the Acts had fallen. One point was that under the Inclosure Act there was no security that land which was inclosed would be applied to the purpose to which it was intended—namely, cultivation. It might be employed for building or planting. Again, the provision of the Inclosure Acts for the protection of the community had become practically inoperative. Until recently it was undoubtedly the acknowledged practice of the Commissioners to look upon inclosures as private improvements, and he believed those gentlemen had acted from a sense of public duty. Latterly, however, inclosure schemes had come to be regarded as affecting the material interests of the public, and great strides had been taken in that direction by Parliament. In 1865 a Committee was appointed to “inquire into the best means of preserving for the public use the Forests, Commons, and Open Spaces in and around the Metropolis,” and in the following year an Act was passed, and was now law, regulating those commons and dealing with them in quite a different way from the manner in which they had been dealt with before. In 1869 a further inquiry was made, and the Committee on this occasion made certain recommendations which had never before been put in force. In the inquiry care should be taken that public objects as well as private objects should be considered by the Commissioners, and that some information should be laid before Parliament not connected with any particular inclosure, but with the general question, in case an Inclosure Bill were passed. He would not detain the House for a moment in discussing those plans in 1870 and 1872 dealing with the proposals of the Commissioners. The history, if he might so call it, of the legislation down to this point would lead many of the Members of that House to some of the following conclusions:—In the first place, it was absolutely necessary that a Bill should not be brought in having the effect of preventing the further inclosure of commons; in the next place, that any Bill brought in should secure to landowners and those interested in commons the same facilities that they hitherto possessed to make inclosures by a comparatively inexpensive process; and although it should not, any more than any of the previous Acts, recognize in any way proprietary rights, unless where they really existed, it should maintain strictly all the private rights of those interested in the commons. When those persons came before Parliament the effect of each inclosure should be carefully ascertained by the Commissioners and brought before the cognizance of Parliament before Parliament was asked to deal with it. There was one more conclusion to which he thought they ought to come—that it was no longer the interest of the State—at least, to nothing like the extent it was some years ago—to interest itself in the multiplication of inclosures. They must now rather consider inclosures as schemes for private improvement, the State seeing that the public interest did not suffer by the inclosures. If the Act of 1845 had been brought forward in the present day, probably greater effect would have been given to it, considering the temper of the country. He did not believe, however, that the full effect of the Act of 1845 was generally known throughout the country. There was no doubt that in that Act there were very strong provisions, and he pointed to one of the sections which required full information from the applicants as to the effects of the inclosure, &c.—its advantages and its results, so far as the poor were concerned. A Report had to be made by the Assistant Commissioner as to whether he considered the inclosure expedient on private and public grounds. He could not forget that when they came to deal with this question, to settle it they must go upon the lines of the Act of 1845, taking care that the provisions to which he referred should be fully carried into effect. If the House would permit him, he would explain what was the intention of the Government in regard to this point. They started in the Preamble by setting out the provisions of the Act to which he had referred, and by stating that which he believed to be emphatically the truth—that it was expedient to give further effect to the provisions set out in the Preamble. They must take into consideration that which the people of this country wanted almost as much as food—the air which they breathed and the health which they enjoyed. It might be that a great deal should be done with these waste lands; but in a very great many cases it was no doubt necessary for the people of the country that inclosures should still be made, but he believed it would be still more necessary that these commons, in a great number of cases, should not be inclosed. He, therefore, provided that they should be dealt with not only under the old Inclosure Acts, by inclosing them separately, but by keeping them as commons, and giving the greatest facility for their regulation and improvement. The Bill provided that the Commissioners might entertain an application for a Provisional Order—first, for the regulation of a common; and, secondly, for the inclosure of the common; and he sincerely hoped, if that Act became law, as he trusted it would, that more applications would be made for the regulation of the commons than for their inclosure. As to the regulation, he divided it into two heads. In the first place, all that might be wanted was simply the practical adjustment of the rights of those interested in the commons. There were, no doubt, many cases where the rights were undefined, and where disputes led to great misunderstanding. He would take the case of commoners' rights. In the matter of pasture he would not deprive any man of his rights; but there were rights of trover and estover which might be detrimental to the common, and then he would give power to compensate those with whose rights they would interfere. He would give compensation in kind or in money. As to improvement, it was clear that there were a great number, such as the commons of Surrey, which no one would think of inclosing, but which were in a lamentable state for want of all sorts of things being done, which there was nobody to do, and for which no funds could be found. He would give all those interested power to apply to the Inclosure Commissioners for a scheme by which a common might be improved, or by which some portions of it might be sold and some sort of rate levied on the holders for the purpose of having the necessary improvements effected. When an application was made under the Provisional Order in considering the expediency of that application, he wished to tie down the Commissioners more closely than had hitherto been the case to the desirability of seeing whether the proposed improvements would be really for the benefit of the neighbourhood as well as for the advantage of private rights. By the benefit of the neighbourhood he meant 'whether they would tend to the health and comfort of the inhabitants of any city or populous place in or near any parish in which the land proposed to be inclosed was situated. That was merely practically re-enacting the words which were to be found in the Act of 1845, and enabling the Commissioners to put in any scheme for inclosure any of those conditions which they might deem to be suitable: such as that free access should be secured to any particular path; that particular trees should be preserved or destroyed; and where no ground for the purposes of recreation was reserved the privilege of playing games at such times and on such parts of the inclosure as might be thought expedient should be secured, so that due care would be taken that injury was not caused to the commoner. He must make some reference to the question of suburban commons. A Bill had been laid before the House with the view of applying the Metropolitan Act to all the great towns throughout the country. That was an Act, however, which it was very difficult to work, and what he wished to see done was that in dealing with inclosures in the neighbourhood of populous places ample security should be taken that a full statement of the facts in each case should be brought before Parliament, and that those who were locally interested in opposing any inclosure should have the opportunity of putting forward their claims and objections. He therefore proposed that notice of any application in the case of a suburban common situated within six miles of a populous place should be served on the urban sanitary authority, and that he should have a right to go before the Assistant Commissioner and ascertain the views of the Board on the question. It was further provided that the urban sanitary authority might acquire by gift or in any other legitimate way a common or any part of it, and the number of persons who would, as he already stated, be required to make an application to the Inclosure Commissioners in the case of an inclosure in severalty might do so in the case to which he was now referring. He did not know whether he need enter further into the details of the Bill; but anyone who had looked into the procedure clauses of the Act of 1845 would see that the question of private rights and public interests was mixed up in a way which was not very clear, and it was, he thought, very much better that they should be practically separated. He had found it very difficult to embody in the clauses, as they stood, of the Act of 1845 all the recommendations of the Committee which sat in 1869; but he had adopted all the recommendations of that Committee, and had inserted the whole of the procedure in the present Bill, repealing, for the purpose, the few sections of the Act of 1845 to which he had just alluded. Hon. Members would, when they saw the Bill, at once find the difference which was established between the evidence relating to questions affecting the benefit of the neighbourhood, and that having reference to private rights. The Government were desirous that on any application for a scheme there should be produced before the Assistant Commissioner all the evidence in favour of the advantages which would be conferred upon the inhabitants of towns as well as that in which private rights were concerned. Then provision was made, not that the Inclosure Commissioners should once a year make any general Report to that House, but that every scheme which came before them, should be separately reported, and, together with the scheme, all the information which they had received in respect to it. It was further proposed for protection of village greens, which were so essential in many parts of the country, that the provisions against encroaching upon them should be strengthened. In a number of old Acts proceedings in such a case could only be taken by certain recognized officers, and the Government had thought it right to make every encroachment on a village green a public nuisance, and to enable any one to proceed against the persons so offending. There was only one further point which remained to be noticed, and that was when the schemes were passed by the Inclosure Commissioners how they were to be dealt with. Now, that was a question of procedure in that House. Originally when the Secretary of State brought in the schemes of the Inclosure Commissioners, his function was one which was purely ministerial in regard to it. Of late years, however, greater interest was taken in the subject, and the Secretary of State for the time being not only brought in those schemes, but had sometimes to force them through the House, although he might never have had an opportunity of pronouncing a judgment as to whether he deemed them to be wise or not. Now, he thought some better plan might be devised, by means of which those schemes might be more carefully watched. He did not regard it as right that the Government should be mixed up with them in the way he had just mentioned, and what he should propose was that some such plan as that which had hitherto existed, in the case of the expiring Turnpike Acts, should be adopted. Those Acts were scheduled, and when the next Session commenced they were referred to a Standing Committee of the House, who reported upon them, and then it was that the Government stepped in, and the recommendation, he might add, of the Committee of 1871 was, that all such schemes as those with which he was now dealing should be laid before a Committee of the House of Commons. Such, then, was the way in which the Government proposed to deal with the question of the inclosure of commons. He believed it was not expedient that an inclosure should take place without full information, and without all objections being heard. It was much more expedient that a large number of commons should be regulated without inclosures; and he hoped when the Bill was considered it would be found that all vested interests had been most carefully guarded, and that people would also see what was equally essential—that we should make greater provision to ensure that the other part of the case would be looked to—namely, the health, comfort, and convenience of those who lived in the neighbourhood of commons, the welfare of small commoners, and the comfort of the labouring poor who were in the habit of frequenting them for the purpose of recreation. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the inclosure of commons was certainly an important subject; but it had not been hitherto regarded as one of such overwhelming interest as to entitle it to a place in the Queen's Speech. If any public interest was felt in the subject, it was in the direction of keeping the commons open rather than inclosing them. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, however, was rather taken from the point of view of lords of manors. The right hon. Gentleman had given an interesting account of the question, but had stopped short at the year 1869. In that year a Committee sat on the question, and came to the conclusion that under the inclosures which had taken place for many years the interests of the public had been gravely neglected; and they drew up a Report recommending that in any future inclosures the interest of the public and neighbouring poor should be carefully guarded. In 1871 he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) brought in a Bill founded on that Report. That Bill was, to a certain extent, a compromise, and was the cause of something like a rupture between himself and hon. Members sitting below the Gangway on his own side of the House. The measure was referred to a Select Committee; which reported in its favour; but it was so vehemently opposed by hon. Members sitting on the other side of the House that it was impossible to proceed with it. In the Session following the Earl of Morley brought in an Inclosure Bill with similar provisions, which was more discussed in the House of Lords than almost any measure of the Session. It had reached a third reading, when it was opposed, and on the Motion of the Duke of Northumberland rejected, on the ground that it interfered with the rights of property. As he understood the Bill now before the House, it was very much the same measure as that brought into the House of Lords. Why, therefore, was not this Bill introduced in the other House? Why should they waste their time in discussing a measure of this kind with the almost certainty that when it went to the House of Lords it would be rejected? [Mr. ASSHETON CROSS: No.] The Bill certainly did not embrace the clauses relative to suburban commons; but otherwise it was substantially the same. [Mr. ASSHETON CROSS: It is a very different Bill.] He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) must remind the right hon. Gentleman that great strides had been made by public opinion on this subject since 1870, and that he, for one, should not be satisfied with the compromise which he was ready to accept in 1870. Various law suits relating to the commons in the neighbourhood of London, especially that of Epping Forest, had since been brought to a conclusion, and the decisions of the Law Courts in regard to the commons at Hampstead, Berkhamstead, and Tooting, had thrown a flood of light on the subject. Moreover, during the last three years a very important movement had been going on among the agricultural labourers, who at all their meetings laid great stress upon their grievances arising out of the inclosure of commons, and no measure would satisfy either them or the public which did not deal with the question in a broader, wider, and more comprehensive spirit than the Bill of 1871. What had to a great extent preserved the commons hitherto had been the uncertainty as to the rights of the various parties. He did not know whether the Bill provided for the regulation as well the inclosure of commons.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that if any application were made for the regulation of commons under this Bill, any scheme of improvement would come under the notice of Parliament.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he believed that very few applications for the regulation of commons would be made under the Bill, and that they would be principally made for inclosures. He should look through the details of the Bill with interest; and if they were really framed on a wide basis, he should give it his cordial support.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to know whether he had understood the Home Secretary to state that the recommendation of the Commission of 1869—that an increased proportion of the land should be reserved—would be followed?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had removed all limit.

MR. GOSCHEN feared that this left the matter at the discretion of the Commissioners and took away the security from the public.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS remarked that the removal of the limit gave the greatest possible security, because that particular fact of the proportion of land reserved must be brought before the notice of Parliament.

MR. GOSCHEN said, this would be one of the points to which the House would direct its attention when the Bill came before it for consideration.

MR. WHITWELL said, he hoped the country would have time to fully consider the Bill before it was further proceeded with.

MR. LEEMAN thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the manner in which he had introduced the Bill, and ventured to think that the measure was one which would give great satisfaction to the country. He had no hesitation in stating that much good for the general public was foreshadowed in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and he believed that all rights would be protected and preserved. The Government were entitled to thanks for taking up a question which had been hung up so long a time, and, in particular, for attempting to provide regulations for large suburban commons, the magnitude of which was out of all proportion to the number of the surrounding population who could make use of them, and the result was they were neglected, to the detriment equally of lords of the manor and of those who had quasi rights over them.

If the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) could see no difference between the Government Bill and that which he introduced in 1871, in the name of reason why did he now oppose the Government Bill? If his propositions were right then, they were right now. The mode of dealing with the commons in the neighbourhood of London could have no influence on the legislation required for commons in the remote districts of the country. He hoped the Home Secretary would proceed with all despatch with a Bill which seemed to contain the elements of good for all concerned.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he had listened with some little astonishment to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken; because, if there was a Member of the House who had done much for the preservation of commons, it was the hon. Member for Reading, and it was not his fault, nor that of the late Government, that they could not carry all their measures. No one he was sure would be more anxious than the hon. Member for Reading to give fair consideration to a Bill aiming at the objects which he had so long laboured to promote.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for facilitating the Regulation and Improvement of Commons, and for the amendment of the Inclosure Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Cross and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 51.]

INDIAN LEGISLATION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Legislation in India with a view to the consolidation thereof, said, it was the same as that which received unanimous support last Session in the House of Lords, but which had to be abandoned through the want of time to pass it. The Bill would consolidate into one Act certain powers conferred on the Governor General contained in three different Acts of Parliament. At present the Governor General could not pass any law which might in any way affect any part of the unwritten law or Constitution of the United Kingdom wherein might depend in any degree the allegiance of any person of the United Kingdom. These words were so vague and so unmeaning that they were very mischievous, and it was proposed to omit them. The Bill would define more accurately the limits within which the Governor General might legislate, and it would alter the machinery by which these limits were at present tested, which was by a multitude of appeals from the local Courts to Courts of Appeal, and terminating in the High Courts of the Presidency. A practice had lately sprung up, where any act of the Governor General was involved in any suit, for counsel to contend that the law was ultra vires, on the ground that the Governor General had exceeded his powers in passing it, and if the Governor General was no party to the suit he had no power to appeal. This Bill proposed to remedy it by declaring that no Court except the High Court of Appeal of any of the Presidencies should have power to declare the law to be ultra vires, and if the Court decided that it was so, the Secretary of State for India would have an ultimate appeal to the Privy Council. The provisions of the Bill had been sanctioned by every Secretary of State for India, and by everyone who had occupied an administrative position in India, and unless some such Bill were passed serious political dangers might arise in India. The Bill gave a clear, distinct, and indisputable title to the Governor General in India to exercise those powers with which he had been invested.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Legislation in India with a view to the consolidation thereof, ordered to be brought in by Lord GEORGE HAMILTON and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (LICENSING LAW AMENDMENT) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE moved that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Licensing Laws.

An hon. MEMBER: What Licensing Laws?

Lord George Hamilton

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE said, those affecting publicans and grocers. His Bill, which was a very modest one, consisted of three clauses only, and if it received the support of the Government he looked with confidence to its becoming law. The object of the measure was to suspend the issue of all fresh publicans' licences within certain limits of population, from 500 in towns and populous places, to 300 in rural parishes, and to suspend the issue of grocers' licences altogether from the present time. If, as already stated, he received assistance from Her Majesty's Government there would not be much difficulty in carrying the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Licensing Laws.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, Mr. BIRLEY, Mr. PEASE, and Mr. BELL.

after Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 11th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Westbury, after the death of his Grandfather.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had prepared and laid it on the Table: The same was ordered to be printed. (No. 4.)

EGYPT—MISSION OF MR. CAVE.
QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY rose to ask the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs a Question of which he had given him private Notice. He wished to ask the noble Earl, Whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared to lay on the Table the Papers and Instructions relative to the mission of Mr. Cave? That mission had excited, not only in the United Kingdom, but in other countries, a great deal of interest, which the explanation given by the noble Earl on Tuesday evening had not tended to allay. That explanation was either more than was wanting, or it was something less. The noble Earl stated—

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON rose to Order. The noble Earl was acting in contravention of the recognized practice of their Lordships' House in making a speech while putting a Question under the circumstances of this particular case. The noble Earl had given private Notice of his Question to his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, and, taking advantage of that Notice, was proceeding to make a speech on a matter of considerable importance.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it certainly was a Rule of their Lordships' House that no Question on which a discussion was likely to arise should be put without Notice in the ordinary way; but he apprehended that the Rule did not apply to observations made merely in explanation of a Question of which private Notice had been given.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he was quite in the hands of the House, and he would be very glad not to make any further observations if the noble Earl said he would produce the Papers.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he was prepared to lay on the Table the Instructions given to Mr. Cave previous to his departure, and some other Papers connected with the subject. Those Instructions and Papers would be laid immediately; but as to any despatches which had passed between the Government and Mr. Cave after that Gentleman went to Egypt, it would be better to wait until his return before those despatches were published.

TRIBUNAL OF FINAL APPEAL—APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose to call the attention of the House to the question of Appeal from the Queen's Courts in Great Britain and Ireland; and to present a Bill on the subject, and said: My Lords, I take the earliest opportunity of again calling your Lordships' attention—and I hope I am not too sanguine in saying for the last time—to the subject of a Tribunal for Final Appeal for the United Kingdom.

My Lords, I shall have to throw myself on your Lordships' indulgence for a short time while I explain the proposals of Her Majesty's Government; but, my Lords, before I bring that explanation before you I shall have to make a short prefatory statement personal to myself. My Lords, I have never attempted on the discussion of the question now before the House to mix up anything of a personal nature; and as I have a few words to say of that character now, I think it better to say them at the beginning, in order that they may be entirely disconnected from anything that is to follow.

My Lords, I heard and saw during the last Session of Parliament various statements—and, indeed, observations were made in this House bearing in the same direction—which implied, on the one hand, that although I might have been responsible for the course taken from time to time on this question by Her Majesty's Government, yet that the course they had taken had not always had my cordial co-operation; and, further, that in any assent I had given to that course I had not been myself consistent. I know there are persons to whom it gives pleasure to think that there are questions on which the Members of a Cabinet are divided in opinion. Now, in this instance, I have to baulk the expectations of such persons, because I think it better at once to say that not only am I technically responsible for the course which the Government have from time to time adopted with reference to the subject of a Tribunal of Final Appeal, but that in every instance the course so taken has had my cordial approbation. My Lords, as regards my own consistency, I venture to think that it is a very small matter. It is a matter of opinion; and my opinion is that I have not been inconsistent. I shall venture to express very shortly the grounds on which I make that assertion. In the year 1856, when a proposition was made in this House by the late Lord Derby for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the practice of the House in the hearing of Appeals, some observations fell from him which impressed me very much, and which express so entirely what I should myself wish to express, that I shall ask your Lordships to allow me to read them. He said—

"My Lords, I shall somewhat shock some of your Lordships by saying that, highly as I value this privilege, I do not consider its maintenance to be so absolutely essential as some noble Lords may think to the fitting discharge of the other functions of your Lordships. I consider it undoubtedly to be a very high privilege, and a most important privilege; and as regards the legal Members of your Lordships' House, it undoubtedly does vest in them, as being such Members, a very high and a very important and responsible jurisdiction; and even with regard to the House at large, I am not prepared to say, though substantially the authority is not practically invested in them, that the apparent semblance of that authority is not in itself a real source of power of which I should be sorry to see your Lordships deprived. But of this I am quite certain, that if it were necessary to take the alternative between the maintenance of any privilege of your Lordships' House, however important or however valuable, and on the other hand the better administration of justice, there is not one of your Lordships who would hesitate in regard to that alternative, and who would not say, let justice be fairly and impartially administered whatever privileges this House may be compelled to forego."—

Now, my Lords, in the year 1856 nothing was done in consequence of the proposals then made by the late Lord Derby towards improving the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House. In 1872 it certainly did appear to me that on the one hand it was impossible that the jurisdiction should continue to be exercised unless accompanied by some improvement; while, on the other hand, up to that time nothing in the direction of improvement had been effected. Therefore, it was that when, in 1872, my noble and learned Friend who was then Lord Chancellor (Lord Hatherley), as the organ of the late Government, proposed in this House a Bill for the transfer of the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House to another tribunal, I refused to accede to that proposal; and your

Lordships, instead of reading the Bill a second time, assented to a Resolution I then moved, substituting an inquiry by a Select Committee, as to whether changes and improvements could not be effected in the administration of the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House. A Committee charged with that inquiry sat—I refer to this as a matter of history—and in the Committee I ventured to make proposals which it appeared to me would have effected the improvements which the administration of the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House required. My proposals had very great support. My noble and learned Friend who was then Lord Chancellor (Lord Hatherley), although he preferred his own plan, yet when he found that the House was not prepared to accede to it, frankly gave me his support. Lord Ripon, then Lord President of the Council, who represented the Government on the Committee, also supported me, as did also the majority of the Committee. But there was a division in the Committee. Of several Members of great authority, some differed as to the details of my plan, and some dissented from the scheme altogether. The result was that the Report of the Committee came down to the House with a divided authority. It did not, I think, obtain very much support in the House, and I know that out-of-doors strong opinions were expressed adversely to it. I am, perhaps, partial to the proposals I then made. I thought then and I still think that they were good; but I was not so blind as not to see that, though the proposals were recommended by a Committee, they could not, perhaps, be carried through this House, and certainly could not be carried through the other House of Parliament. It appeared to me, then, that improvements were required in the administration of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House, and that it was not likely that those improvements would be approved by Parliament. Such was the state of things when, in 1873, my noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne), who then filled the position which I have now the honour to occupy proposed his measure carrying into effect the recommendations of the Judicature Commission, and I gave him my support. I was keenly anxious that the part of that great scheme which did not affect this House should pass into law. As regarded the improvement of the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House, I found there was perfect apathy; and, looking at the substance rather than the form, I gave my support to the Bill of my noble and learned Friend, though I did not approve that portion of the measure which suppressed intermediate appeal and gave a final appeal instead of it. When Her Majesty's present Government came into Office they found the measure of my noble and learned Friend the law of the land; and it appeared to us that as a Government we had only one course to pursue—namely, with the view of accepting what had been done in the case of final appeals in England, to propose a similar rule in the case of such appeals from Scotland and from Ireland, and to make an addition to the scheme of 1873 by the constitution of an Intermediate Tribunal of Appeal, which appeared to me to be necessary. Your Lordships will remember that the Bill to effect those objects passed your Lordships' House and went down to the other House of Parliament, where the Business of the Session before that House did not allow of the Bill being passed into law. We now come to last year. In 1875 the Government took the only course which, as it appears to me, was open to them. They re-introduced the Bill which passed this House in 1874; and then it became evident that a very great change had arrived—a change of opinion not merely in this House, but out of this House. The Government were made aware of that—not only in one way, but in scores of ways. The change of opinion was manifest; and the Government became aware that it would be utterly impossible to pass the measure in the form it had been passed in this House the previous year. But that was not all. So obvious was the change of public opinion that Her Majesty's Government considered it to be their duty to re-consider the question now that a new element had entered into it, and that could have been done in no other way than by the withdrawal of the Bill. My Lords, at the time it was being withdrawn, I stated that I looked on its withdrawal with very great regret. And I did so, for this reason—because it was my opinion at the time that the withdrawal of the Bill must result in the whole scheme for the amendment of our system of Judicature being deferred. It had already been postponed for two years, and it appeared to me that a postponement for a third year was inevitable. But subsequently I was glad, and the Government were glad, to see our way to a Bill which Parliament approved, and which, while addressing itself to the other portions of our system of Judicature, postponed for a year only the question of the Tribunal of Final Appeal. That Bill became law. The great change in our system of Judicature came into operation on the 1st of November last; and I am bound to say that every day makes me more satisfied of the wisdom of Parliament in at once introducing that great change by itself, and relegating to another occasion the question of Final Appeal. Now, my Lords, I have done as far as regards myself. I hold the opinion which I have held from first to last, and I think the course I have taken has been a perfectly consistent one; my desire has always been to secure the best Tribunal of Final Appeal that it is possible to obtain—I never had, and I have not, any other desire in the matter than that.

Before I proceed to explain our proposals for the future, let me, my Lords, say a word as to the results of the Judicature Act now in operation. I am not going to trespass on your Lordships with elaborate statistics—indeed, the length of time during which the Act has been in operation does not admit of the production of such statistics;—but I feel the deepest gratification in saying—and I am sure my noble and learned Friend by whose exertions this great measure was set on foot will feel the deepest gratification in hearing—that so far as I can observe, the working of the Judicature Act has been in the highest degree satisfactory. The working of the Act has been characterized by flexibility, simplicity, uniformity, and economy of judicial time. These have ensured the happiest results already, and these results afford hopeful augury for the future of the measure. And, my Lords, I cannot refer to this subject without bearing my testimony—my grateful testimony—to the frank and generous exertions made by every Division of the Court in giving effect to the Act. My Lords, one can well understand that those who have had long experience of an old system and practice, and are thoroughly conversant with it, might be expected to be somewhat coy in giving their assistance to the working of a new one. But on the part of the Judges there has been none of that feeling. They have shown not energy merely, but ardour, in giving effect to the new legislation, and I believe that it is owing to this spirit on the part of the Judges that the happy results of the measure are in a large degree to be attributed. Though, as I said, I am not going to quote elaborate statistics, I shall mention one or two circumstances by which your Lordships may be enabled to form an opinion as to the advantages which have already resulted from the change. On the 1st of November last there were in the three Common Law Courts—The Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and the Exchequer, which are now three Divisions of the High Court of Justice—380 Nisi Prius cases, which had been made remanets, and were waiting for trial. That was a very serious amount of arrears; and I am afraid to say how long a time must have elapsed, according to the former practice, before those remanets could have been disposed of. But from the 1st of November last six Nisi Prius Courts sat—first at Westminster and afterwards at Guildhall—and before Christmas the whole of these 380 cases had been, I will not say heard, but called on, so that the suitors in every one of them were afforded an opportunity of having their case heard if they themselves were prepared to have it disposed of. Of course, several cases were called on and subsequently deferred at the instance of the parties because it suited their convenience; but the suitors in all those cases had, I believe, an opportunity of having their cases heard. My Lords, there is another fact. On the same date—the 1st of November last—there were standing for hearing from the three Divisions—the Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer—27 appeals, which, according to the former practice, would have been heard by the Court of Exchequer Chamber. I cannot say what time would have elapsed before these Appeals in Error would have been disposed of, but I think the Court of Exchequer Chamber was not in the habit of disposing of more than 27 cases in a year. However, the whole of those 27 Appeals were heard and judgment given in them before Christmas. I believe that judgment on one point only was held over, but, with that exception, the whole of them were heard and disposed of. I think I may say, therefore, that the working of the Act has led to the best possible results in respect of economy of judicial time.

I now, my Lords, come to the question of the Tribunal of Final Appeal. In the course of last Session I took the liberty of saying that there were certain points which the Government would consider essential in any proposal on this subject that they might make to the House, and these, I think, were four in number. First, that the Tribunal should be the same for England, Scotland, and Ireland; secondly, that security should be taken that every case heard before that Tribunal should be heard before an adequate number of the most highly trained and experienced judicial minds that the country could supply; thirdly, that the sitting of the Tribunal, whatever it might be, should be continuous throughout the judicial year; and fourthly, that care should be taken that the expense of appealing before the Tribunal should be kept within as moderate bounds as the nature of the case would allow. My Lords, I took the liberty of saying that in my opinion if those conditions could be secured, the question where or in what form that Tribunal should be found was, I would not say unimportant, but comparatively unimportant, as compared with the securing of those conditions. It might be a question of sentiment, prestige, or of traditionary honour and dignity, and if its solution could be accomplished while these greater objects were secured, that, of course, would be the most desirable result at which we could arrive. My Lords, I would now venture to those essentials which I enumerated last Session to add another. Perhaps I should not say it is an essential; but, at least, it would be very desirable. My Lords, I venture to think it would be very desirable if it could be accomplished, that a point of contact should be obtained from the Tribunal of Final Appeal for the United Kingdom and the tribunal which now disposes of appeals from the colonies and dependencies of the Crown. I mean, of course, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

I do not propose to ask your Lordships to accompany me in an investigation of antiquarian law, but I think your Lordships will hold me justified in asking you for a moment to consider what is the origin of the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House in which we sit. My Lords, we are in the habit of saying and recognizing as one of the maxims of Constitutional law on which we set the greatest store that the source and fountain of all justice in this country is the Sovereign. My Lords, let us look at the Courts. The Court of Queen's Bench—what does it mean? Justice is there administered, according to our idea of the Constitution, before the Sovereign through the medium of her Justices. Then the Court of Common Pleas—justice is there administered by the Justices of the Queen. Then the Court of Exchequer—justice is there administered by the Barons of the Queen. In the Court of Chancery justice is administered as in the Queen's Court, and when I turn to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the source of its authority is even more marked, because there the Sovereign directly refers the case to be considered to the Judicial Committee, that Committee reports its decision to the Sovereign, and the Sovereign gives it effect by an Order in Council. My Lords, whence is the jurisdiction of this House? Is it the case that this House overrules by its own authority the judgment given by the Queen, through her Judges in the Court of Queen's Bench and other Courts? Now, my Lords, this appears to me to be a matter of no small importance, and I ask your Lordships' attention to it for a few moments. My Lords, there is no doubt as to the history of the jurisdiction of this House. I ask you to bear in mind the distinction between two parts of its jurisdiction which are essentially different. No doubt your Lordships are aware of the technical difference in this House between Writs of Error and Appeals. Writs of Error related to the Common Law Courts—the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and the Exchequer. The judgments of those Courts are subjects of Writs of Error. My Lords, what is a Writ of Error? It is a writ issuing from the Sovereign and in the name of the Sovereign. It is a writ directed to the Chief of the Court—the Lord Chief Justice, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, or the Lord Chief Baron—and it commands him to bring to the Bar of your Lordships' House the record of action as to which complaint has been made, and to hand it in, in order that it may be considered by the Queen in the presence of, and with the assistance of, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal. That is the source of the jurisdiction of this House. The source is not a claim by this House to overrule the decision of the Courts—it is the Sovereign of the country asking the advice of this Court as to whether what has been done by the inferior Courts has been done rightly or wrongly. Let me read the words of the form—though forms may be dry things—yet I am anxious to get at the root of the matter, and forms give a great deal of information. I hold in my hand the form of a Writ of Error, which, though it was abolished two years ago, is good for the purpose of showing the source of the jurisdiction of this House. It is addressed to the Chief of the Court, and it commands him—

“That you do distinctly and openly send under your seal a transcript of the record and proceedings thereon, with all things touching the same, to us in our present Parliament [or if Parliament be not then sitting, in our Parliament at the next Session thereof, to wit, on the day of next ensuing, to be holden], and this writ, that the record and proceedings thereon being reviewed, we may further cause to be done thereupon, with the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal in the same Parliament, for correcting the error, what of right and according to the law and custom of England ought to be done.”

Formerly the Chief of the Court came to the Bar of the House and handed in the record: now that is done by an officer of the Court. The form then proceeds:—

“Afterwards”—that is to say, after the transcript of the record had reached the House of Lords—“on the day of before our said Lady the Queen and the Peers of this Realm in the present Parliament at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, assembled, comes the said C. D. by G. H. his attorney, and says that in the record and proceedings aforesaid, and also in giving the judgment aforesaid, there is manifest error, &c., and the said C. D. thereupon prays that the judgment may be reversed, &c.”

Then the duty of the defendant is pointed out—

“Defendant comes, and by his attorney says—‘that there is no error either in the record and proceedings aforesaid or in giving the judgment aforesaid, and he prays that the Court of Our Lady the Queen, in her Parliament here, may proceed to examine as well the record and proceedings aforesaid as the matters aforesaid above assigned for error, and that the judgment aforesaid may be in all things affirmed,’ &c.”

The Lord Chancellor

Then what does the House when it comes to a decision—

“Whereupon all and singular the premises being seen, and by the Court of Parliament then and there fully understood, and as well the record and proceedings aforesaid, and the judgment aforesaid given in form aforesaid, as also the causes and matters aforesaid by the said C. D. as above for error assigned being by the said Court diligently examined, reviewed, and fully understood, and mature deliberation being thereupon had, it seemed to the Court of Parliament now here that there is manifest error in the record and proceedings aforesaid, and in giving and affirming the judgment aforesaid. Therefore it is considered by the said Court of our said Lady the Queen in her Parliament here that the judgment aforesaid in form aforesaid given by the said Court of our said Lady the Queen before the Queen herself at Westminster in form aforesaid for the errors aforesaid and other errors therein being, be reversed, annulled, and altogether holden for nothing, and that the said A. B. &c. be restored to all things which he hath lost by occasion of the said several judgments, and thereupon the record aforesaid remitted from the Court of Parliament aforesaid to the Court of our said Lady the Queen before the Queen herself, to the end that execution may be had thereupon, and the same now remain in the said Court, to wit, at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex.”

It will be seen from this form, my Lords, that so far from the old jurisdiction of this House being such as would imply that the House interfered with the action of the Courts of the Sovereign, it is the Sovereign here acting in concert and consultation with this House who reviews the judgments of her Courts, and does away with any error which those Courts may have committed. That is the case as regards Writs of Error. And when was the origin of Writs of Error? My Lords, it is a very ancient jurisdiction. We know that Writs of Error were in use as early as the reign of Edward I., and I believe that we stop there, because there are no records to carry us further back. I believe they are coeval with the Magnum Concilium of the Sovereign, and that it was to this Great Council that the Sovereign applied in the last resort for assistance in dealing with the cases presented for his decision. But at what time did the jurisdiction of this House in respect of appeals arise? As compared with the jurisdiction in Writs of Error, it is a thing of yesterday. It was utterly unknown until the middle of the 17th century. Then it was that for the first time appeals were brought here from the Court of Chancery. Your Lordships are aware that the jurisdiction claimed for this House in the case of appeals gave rise to great debate and great controversies. I am not, however, referring to it for that purpose, but for a very different one. It happened that the first time your Lordships' House exercised the jurisdiction of hearing appeals from the Court of Chancery, the appeal brought up was unfortunately not couched in the form of a Writ of Error, but in that of a Petition addressed to your Lordships as the Peers Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled. I believe that was little more than an oversight, but the appeal took the form I have described and has continued it; and it is my opinion that a great deal that has been said against the jurisdiction of this House has been advanced under the objection which fairly lay against this novel hearing of appeals, and is by no manner of means applicable to the early and original jurisdiction of this House and the early and truthful way in which that jurisdiction was exercised. There is an essay of Lord Hale's on this subject, and, though in the early part of it there is a good deal that is technical, very broad views are laid down in this tract. Lord Hale was no enemy to the jurisdiction of this House, but he made various suggestions which are worthy of attention, and there are one or two sentences of his which I should like to quote. He says—

“All jurisdiction in this realm, whether ecclesiastical or civil, is derived from the Crown; and the exercise thereof in the Ministers or Judges, to whom it is so delegated by the Crown, is in right of the Crown and by virtue of a delegation from it. And it were a thing scarce consistent with the Monarchical Government that those sentences, judgments, or decrees, which are pronounced and given by the King's authority and commission, should be examined by an original jurisdiction lodged in the House of Lords without especial authority given by the King by writ, commission, or endorsement. This were to make the basis of the Government aristocratical, since the last devolution of appeals would be from the King, and the judgments given by his authority unto the Lords. . . . As the decrees are passed by the King's authority, so by the same authority they are avoided, if there be cause; and not by a kind of primitive, superintendent, inherent jurisdiction in the Lords' House, which some may possibly think savours too much of an aristocracy, giving an appeal from the King to the Lords by an inherent right of a dernier resort, which seems not agreeable to the constitution of the English Government.”

tion which I have endeavoured to explain, and I am so for two reasons. If any alteration in the jurisdiction of this House is made, and if that jurisdiction is continued with regard to appeals, I hold it to be a matter of paramount importance that the true basis of the jurisdiction should be exactly understood and recognized.

My Lords, Her Majesty's Government are about to propose a measure for the improvement of the jurisdiction of this House; and the first alteration they propose is that in all cases in which there are appeals to this House there should be a recognition of this principle—that this House in judicial matters sits here as the adviser of the Sovereign; that it is the Court of Parliament advising the Sovereign. We propose that this shall appear by the form of Petition. We desire that this should be done before any other change is made. It is not a matter of form—it is to my mind a matter of substance. It is all important that it should be done now because, by reason of changes brought about by the Judicature Act, we have put an end to the formality of Error; and therefore those proceedings in Error which before now were a test of jurisdiction in this House, will cease to have any existence.

I shall now state the tribunal before which it is proposed those appeals shall be brought. We propose that there shall be in this House Lords of Appeal; and I will state to your Lordships of whom we propose this body shall be constituted. It will be constituted, in the first place, of those Members of the House of Lords who have filled certain “high judicial offices” in the State—these will include the Lord Chancellor, ex-Lord Chancellors, and others who have filled high judicial offices and have seats in this House. In addition, we propose that there should be appointed in the first instance two other Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, to be selected from persons of high qualifications at the Bar or on the Bench; and that while they hold their office as Lords of Appeal, they shall receive a writ of summons as Barons and shall sit and vote in this House like other Peers. We propose that they shall hold their rank for life, that they should have a salary of £6,000 a-year, which is £1,000 a-year more than the salary of the ordinary Judges, and, as I said, we propose that in the first instance their number should be two. As to continuous sittings, we have to provide for the case of Prorogation and for the case of Dissolution. As to the case of Prorogation, there is no difficulty. In the Bill which passed your Lordships' House in 1856, went to the other House of Parliament, and was there laid aside, there was a clause providing that for the purposes of judicial business this House should sit during Prorogations at any times for such sitting which had been fixed before the Prorogation. We purpose that there should be a similar provision in the Bill which will embody the propositions which I am now submitting to your Lordships. I omitted to state, when speaking of the constitution of the Tribunal by Lords of Appeal, that Her Majesty's Government propose that no case should be heard in this House unless three Lords of Appeal are present. With regard to Dissolutions, there is, of course, the possibility of a Court of Final Appeal being required during that interregnum; but, in point of fact, I doubt whether it ever would be desirable to have an Appellate Court sitting at such a time—which under our present electoral arrangements is usually very short. Experience shows us that the people in this country are so much occupied in other matters at such a time that they are not disposed to prosecute with energy appeals before a Court of Ultimate Jurisdiction. We have, however, a precedent for what could be done. If it should be necessary to assemble the Tribunal at such a time, we have a precedent for the way of doing it in an old statute passed in the reign of Edward III., when the intervals between the dissolution of one Parliament and the summoning of another were much longer than they are now. That is a precedent for enabling the Sovereign to assemble the Lords of Appeal by issuing a Royal Commission, requiring them to meet for the dispatch of judicial business, and to exercise the same powers as if Parliament were sitting; and if so assembled they would have the same powers as at any ordinary sitting of the House. That disposes of the question of continuous sittings.

Now comes the other question—the desirability of obtaining a point of contact, if it can be done, with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Your Lordships are aware that there are at present in that Committee four Members who are called salaried Members of the Judicial Committee. They were constituted by an Act which passed a few years ago, and practically the disposing of appeals rests mainly with these learned persons. My Lords, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has before it the appeals which come from the colonies and the dependencies of the Crown: if the proposals of Her Majesty's Government are approved by Parliament, this House, sitting in the way I have described, would have before it the appeals coming from the United Kingdom—that is, the portion of the dominions of the Queen directly under the Parliamentary Government of the Imperial Parliament. Of course it would be very desirable that between those two bodies disposing of judicial business—the one disposing of business coming from within the ambit of the authority of Parliament, and the other of business coming from outside the ambit of that authority—there should be some legal point of contact. In the case of the four salaried Members of the Judicial Committee there can be no fresh appointment under the Act constituting them. If their offices became vacant, no person could be appointed to them without a fresh provision by Parliament. Now, what we propose is this. We do not propose to interfere in any way with those four Members acting on the Judicial Committee; but what we do propose is this—that, when there are two vacancies among those four salaried Members, there should be a power of appointing one other Lord of Appeal in this House; and so likewise, when two other vacancies of salaried Members occur, there should be a power of appointing one more Lord of Appeal—so as to make four salaried Lords of Appeal in this House. The result, therefore, will be that, when the four salaried Members of the Privy Council have come to an end of their office, there will be four Lords of Appeal in ordinary, and we propose that they, being Privy Councillors, should be charged with the duty of sitting in the Privy Council as well as of performing their duties in this House.

I shall now state the amount of business which would have to be discharged by these two Tribunals. Without troubling your Lordships with too many details, I may state, taking an average, that the judicial business which falls to this House in a year and that which falls to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the same period is such as would require the sitting days to be not less than 200 and not more than 300. In fact, the sitting days may be nearer to 200 than 300; 300 days at the most; and that would be sufficient for the discharge of the business of both Tribunals. Let me state to your Lordships that the judicial year may be said to comprise 200 days. Any tribunal which sits during the judicial year is said to sit for 200 days in the year. Therefore, as regards this House and the Judicial Committee you get this state of things—the business to be disposed of is rather more than could be done by one tribunal, and rather less than could be done by two tribunals, sitting throughout the judicial year. Therefore, if you get a tribunal which can sit in two divisions, you will have a tribunal which can easily dispose of the business of both this House and the Privy Council. There will be in this House the Lord Chancellor, and ultimately four Lords of Appeal in ordinary, and they will have the great assistance which I trust we shall long enjoy of the Peers who have filled the post of Lord Chancellor or other high judicial offices, and in the Privy Council there will be always several ex officio Members of the Judicial Committee; so that your Lordships will see that with the most perfect facility such a tribunal may dispose of the business both of the House of Lords and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In cases of such importance as to require the presence of five Lords of Appeal, we can have them; but when three are deemed to be sufficient—and, as a general rule, I think three is the best number for a Court of Appeal—the tribunal may be constituted for hearing by the presence of three Judges. It may be asked why the Government do not propose at once to constitute four Lords of Appeal, and why they only for the present purpose to appoint two. It is for this reason: The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are doing their work with great care and diligence, and we think it better not to make any change in that Court until it shall come in the natural course of events. This House possesses in my noble and learned Friends an unusual number of Judges who have held judicial office and who are qualified to sit in Appeals; and this House is, therefore, in no immediate distress in point of numbers for a larger Court of Final Appeal than I have proposed. But above and before this there is another reason. It is undesirable at any one moment to make a great drain upon the Bar for the supply of new Judges. The Bar is like other professions, and cannot afford to give to the Bench more than a limited number of its highly trained members at any given time. The country gains by taking from time to time such members of the Bar as prove themselves fitted for judicial office; but, unless in case of absolute necessity, a proposal to take either from the Bench or the Bar any great number of their members is to be deprecated.

Let me now say a word upon another point—the question of expense. Some persons have said that this House is a very expensive tribunal. Now, there are three elements of expense connected with the judicial business of this House, and it ought to be distinctly understood what they are. One element is the fees of this House, which must be paid, of course, by the suitors. The second is the cost of printing the records and books which constitute the subject of the appeal. The third is the professional remuneration of the advisers of the parties. Now, with regard to the fees of this House I have made some inquiry, and I find that the fees which have to be paid by the appellant amount to about £20 and by the respondent to about £17. So far as I know of the expenses of other Courts, I have a great suspicion that the expenses of appeals to your Lordships' House will contrast not unfavourably but favourably with any other Court in the country. The printing of the books and records in the case no doubt occasions expense, and if it can be lessened it would be desirable that it should be diminished. But I am bound to say that wherever you may place your Court of Final Appeal it is important that every scrap of paper should be in print in orderly and proper form; for my experience convinces me that very often errors in the decisions of the Courts below have been discovered just as much from the orderly and clear way in which printed papers bring the case before the mind as from any superior knowledge of the law possessed by the higher tribunal.

With regard to the remuneration of the professional advisers, it is impossible for any tribunal to exercise any control over this element of expense. It may be assumed that cases which come before a Court of Final Appeal are always of considerable importance—the parties are naturally anxious to obtain the best professional advice that can be had—it is in the nature of things that the highest class of professional assistance should cost most money; and I am afraid we cannot prevent the parties from indulging themselves in the luxury of such assistance. It is quite true you may lay down some rules by which the unsuccessful party shall not have to pay costs except according to a fixed and regulated tariff of charges for professional assistance. What the Government propose on that head is that, if this scheme is adopted, there should be a Committee of Inquiry of your Lordships' House into this question of expense, in order that it may be brought down to the lowest point to which it can be brought with regard to the nature of the case.

We also propose that, although there is at present an Appeal Committee which meets at certain intervals, and before which matters of practice connected with appeals are brought, a more regular system should be adopted. We propose that an Appeal Committee should be constituted out of the Lords of Appeal, and that they should meet regularly once a week to dispose of all matters of practice now disposed of by the General Appeal Committee.

I have now gone through the proposal of the Government. With regard to the Final Court of Appeal, your Lordships will have observed that our proposals provide one Court of Final Appeal for every part of the United Kingdom. We provide that an adequate number of highly-trained judicial minds shall be present at every appeal—that the sitting of the tribunal should be continuous during the whole of the judicial year—and that the expense of the tribunal should be regulated as far as possible. We also establish a point of contact between the judicial proceedings of this House and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, because in substance they will be the same tribunal, although acting with different forms and dealing with different business.

There are certain further proposals of

the Government which relate, not to the Court of Final Appeal, but to the Court of Intermediate Appeal. Last year there was established a new Court of Intermediate Appeal. That Court was constituted of three permanent Judges of Appeal and five ex officio Judges, who may sit as time and opportunity serve—namely, the Lord Chancellor, the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the Master of the Rolls, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer—making in all eight members. In addition, the Court has the power to ask for the attendance of two of the Primary Judges at any time when they are required: so that you have got nominally 10 names on the roll of that Court. Last year great objections were made to this Intermediate Court of Appeal. It was said it was very weak, and would be the Exchequer Chamber over again. I certainly did not agree with those objections, and I agree still less with them now that we have had experience of the working of the Court. That Court has in it two very excellent elements—one, that you have a nucleus of permanent members who never change, and the other that you have the power of supplementing those members by the addition of two Primary Judges, and such of the Chiefs as the occasion may require. Another advantage is that we are always in this country very much embarrassed about the disposition of judicial time. The great strain upon the Judges is at the time of Circuits, and you want more Judges during that time than at any other period of the year. By the Bill of last year, when the Judges are not going on Circuit you are able to obtain the attendance of two of the Primary Judges in the Intermediate Appeal Court, and in that way their time is utilized to great advantage. I have seen this Court at work; and, so far as I can collect, public opinion is in favour of the working of the Court as constituted by the Act of last year. That is, therefore, a Court which may be continued to act as it has been doing. We do, however, propose with a view to the future to strengthen that Court, and in this way. I have referred to the four salaried Members of the Judicial Committee. We propose that when two of those offices become vacant, and when a Lord of Appeal is appointed, so also an additional member of the Intermediate Court of Appeal may be appointed; and likewise when the remaining two salaried Members of the Judicial Committee shall retire or die, another Member of the Intermediate Court of Appeal may be appointed. The result of that will be that when the whole system comes into operation you will have in this House, besides the Lord Chancellor, four Lords of Appeal in ordinary, bound to discharge the judicial business of this House, and of the Privy Council, and you will have in the Intermediate Court of Appeal five permanent Members of that Court, who, with the very slight additional assistance they will require from the Primary Judges, will be able to discharge the whole of the business of that Court in a manner that will be satisfactory to the country.

There is still one more change, which it will be convenient to mention here. The Judicature Act of 1873 proposed that there should be a reduction in the number of the Primary Judges, and that two of the number of Primary Judges should not be re-appointed. When the Act of last year passed the other House that provision was repealed, and the Primary Judges were restored to their former number. My Lords, looking at the arrears to be disposed of, I think that was a wise thing. But as soon as the propositions I have made have come into operation—as soon as the Intermediate Court of Appeal has been strengthened in the manner I have mentioned—the time will have arrived when, the arrears having been entirely worked off, we shall be able as I hope to dispense with two of the Primary Judges; and the more so because all the new Judges that may be appointed will be bound to go Circuit. I therefore think, that when that period arrives, two of the Primary Judges may be dispensed with. The result of the whole will be that you will then have, for the purposes of Appeal, the four Lords of Appeal in this House and five members of the Intermediate Court of Appeal. I may mention that is exactly the same number—not one more—than was proposed by the Judicature Act of 1873; and yet by the different arrangement of the same materials we shall have secured what I believe your Lordships will think, what certainly I think, an efficient Court of Intermediate as well as of Final Appeal. You will also have the same reduction in the number of Primary Judges. My Lords, I refer to the number of Judges and their reduction, not because I think this country would grudge any expenditure that would really be necessary for the purpose, but because I think it is satisfactory that we should be able to keep these large proposals which I have now made within proper bounds and compass. I think that, while on the one hand a sufficient amount of judicial power is absolutely necessary, any superfluity of judicial power is a positive evil. No judicial body works so efficiently as when fully occupied. This consideration is not only important with regard to the money expended, but with regard to the efficiency of the service itself; and I believe it is above all things important that here in England, as distinguished from other parts of the dominion, we should set an example that we have not provided more judicial force than is required. We have to call on another part of the Empire to submit to a reduction, and certainly we ought to take care that our own staff is not greater than is requisite. I believe that under the proposal I have now made we shall have all we require. I believe we shall have the most efficient Court of Appeal which the country can desire, and I trust, on full consideration, the proposals I have made will have your Lordships' approval.

Bill for amending the Law in respect of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords; and for other purposes, presented (The Lord Chancellor).

LORD SELBORNE: My Lords, my noble and learned Friend has detailed, with his usual clearness, a series of most important proposals which your Lordships will deliberately consider—as I promise to do—with a sincere desire to do the best that can be done for the administration of justice in such a manner as may be final, at all events for many years to come. It would not be fitting or convenient that I should now discuss in detail any of those proposals. We must have the time and opportunity for deliberately considering them—which, no doubt, we shall have before the second reading of the Bill. There are, however, some parts of the speech of my noble and learned Friend on which I think it right to make a very few observations. First of all, with respect to that part which was personal to my noble and learned Friend himself. If there be any one Member of your Lordships' House who is bound to express his assent to the vindication he offered of himself—if, indeed, vindication was necessary from the charge of inconsistency—if such a charge has been made anywhere against my noble and learned Friend—I am certainly bound to express my full and unqualified assent to what my noble and learned Friend has said on that subject. The course he has taken in this matter from first to last is before your Lordships and the country. I am bound always to acknowledge the patriotic and generous way in which my noble and learned Friend supported the proposals I had to make to Parliament in 1873—a course worthy of himself, and the only course I could have expected; because, so far as related to the other subjects of that measure, except what affected your Lordships' House and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, he himself had contributed in no small degree in the Judicature Commission to the maturing of the proposals I embodied in that measure. On the subject of the Appellate Jurisdiction of your Lordships' House, I am bound also to say that my noble and learned Friend at that time, being very frank as well as kind in his communications with myself, did not conceal the preference he would have felt for retaining—for certain purposes at all events—an ultimate recourse to your Lordships' House; and if he did not press that view as the measure passed through this House, it was only, I believe, because he did not attribute, in the then state of public feeling on the subject, sufficient importance to it to delay the passing of the measure. My Lords, I heard, with the greatest satisfaction, the testimony borne by my noble and learned Friend to the successful working of that measure during the short period, and that a most trying period of transition, while the Judicature Act has been in operation; and the importance of that testimony will be felt the more when you recollect what were the four great objects which that measure had in view, only one of which really could be adequately tested during the period that has now elapsed. The first object was the economizing of judicial power, and by that the prevention of delay as well as of cost to suitors.

Lord Selborne

That object has been tested, even in the short period which has elapsed; and I think the most sanguine supporters of the measure could hardly have expected a greater degree of success than that, to which my noble and learned Friend has borne his testimony. The other three objects were these—first of all, to unite, under one administration, the whole law of the country—Common Law and Equity—the result of which could only be obtained in the course of time: but I have heard nothing to shake my belief in the probable success—as well as the great importance—of that change. Then there was the simplification of procedure, which stands, to a great extent, on the same ground with the fusion of Law and Equity, sufficient time not having yet elapsed to test its entire success; but I am glad to hear from my noble and learned Friend that as far as experience has yet gone it has given satisfaction; and if satisfactory to him, with his opportunities of knowledge, it is likely, I am sure, to be satisfactory to the country. The fourth object of the Bill which I introduced was undoubtedly a very important one;—the re-constitution of the Appellate Jurisdiction. Undoubtedly, and I still think unfortunately, through the circumstances to which my noble and learned Friend has referred, the scheme of the measure of 1873 has in that respect been displaced. My noble and learned Friend has now proposed another elaborate scheme, as to which, all I can now say is, that, although not at present satisfied that it is equally advantageous with that of 1873, I shall consider it without the slightest personal feeling in the matter, and with every desire to secure the object, which must necessarily be common to myself and to my noble and learned Friend.

LORD DENMAN said, that he considered the legal origin of appeals to the House of Lords to arise from the Act which the Lord Chancellor had quoted, as to the power of sitting in Vacation—namely, 14 Edward III., c. 5—in which delays in Chancery were specially included—Commons, Lords, and the Royal Assent—legalized the appointment of a Committee; (having the statute book before him) he referred to the terms of the Act. He had the same opinion that he held in 1856 as to the unconstitutional nature of the proposed appointments, and being 70 years of age, he could only warn the House against evils which he foresaw, and to the possibility of which, in 1856 and 1873, this House had too readily assented. He would be happy if, before he was gathered to his Fathers, he could see a more constitutional measure adopted than those Acts or the Bill in its present shape.

Bill read 1st; to be printed. (No. 5.)

CHURCH ENDOWMENTS IN GIBRALTAR.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the consent of the Crown has been given to an Ordinance constituting Church bodies for the Anglican and Roman Catholic communities at Gibraltar, with the object of vesting in such bodies annual grants of money?

MR. J. LOWTHER: An Ordinance, Sir, has been drawn up with the object of continuing to the Church of England and Roman Catholic Church Bodies at Gibraltar, in the form of an annual fixed payment, the sums hitherto paid to individual clergymen and priests. This Ordinance has not, as yet, I believe, been enacted by the local Government, and has therefore not received the Royal Assent.

EGYPT—MISSION OF MR. CAVE—THE PURCHASE OF THE SUEZ CANAL SHARES.—QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer (in the absence of the Prime Minister), Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Instructions to Mr. Cave in regard to his mission to Egypt, and any Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Khedive on the subject of that mission? Perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to put another Question on the same subject to him which he may possibly be able to answer. He will, I suppose, have a very important statement to make on Monday next respecting the financial bearings of the purchase by Her Majesty's Government of the interest possessed by the Khedive in the shares of the Suez Canal; and I therefore wish to ask him, Whether it is the intention of the Government to ask the House on Monday evening to proceed to take the Vote which he will lay upon the Table of the House; or, whether the Government will, in accordance with what I conceive to be the convenience of hon. Members, as well as with our ordinary practice, give the House another opportunity of considering the statement which the right hon. Gentleman will have to make?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: As to the first Question, Sir, of the noble Lord, the mission of Mr. Cave is not yet completed; but there will be no objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence between the Government and the Khedive which led to the appointment of that mission and the instructions to Mr. Cave. Those Papers shall be printed in the course of this evening, and will, I hope, be in the hands of hon. Members before the discussion comes on on this subject on Monday night. In reply to the noble Lord's second Question, I may say that, as he did not give me Notice of it, I have not had an opportunity of consulting the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government in reference to it; but I am quite sure that there will be every disposition on the part of the Government to consult what may appear to be the wishes of the House on this matter. With reference to the Question which was put to me last night without Notice by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), I may take this opportunity of stating that the Papers of which he spoke, relating to the Concessions of the Company and to the Firmans by which those Concessions were granted, will be prepared and laid before the House, although I am afraid that it will take some time before that can be done. For the convenience of hon. Members who wish to know the nature of those Concessions, I may state that they are all contained in Volumes 55 and 56 of Hertslet's State Papers, which are in the Library. They will, however, be separately printed for the convenience of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I wish to explain, Sir, that although I did not give the right hon. Gentleman Notice of my intention to put a Question to him on this subject this evening, I had reason to believe that my right hon. Friend the Member for Kinross (Mr. Adam) had asked the Secretary to the Treasury privately yesterday whether it was the intention of the Government to ask the House to take the Vote in question on Monday. I thought, therefore, that the matter had been brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman.

POST OFFICE—MAIL ROUTES IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Postmaster General, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House, Copy of a map showing the routes by which mails are carried in Ireland to and from the different post-offices; and also showing in each case where the mails are forwarded by railway, car, or foot messenger?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, a corrected Map of the kind referred to would be ready in about a month, and he should be happy to send a copy of it to the hon. and gallant Member, who would perhaps confer with him afterwards as to laying a copy of it on the Table of the House.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870—COMPULSORY ATTENDANCE—CASE OF GEORGE BEAVIS.—QUESTIONS.

tion, Whether his attention has been directed to a letter which appeared in "The Kentish Mercury" of the 22nd January, and was reprinted in "The Times" of the 3rd February 1876, signed "George Beavis," in which the writer complained of having been fined two shillings with one shilling costs for neglecting to send his child, a girl seven years of age, to school, under the following circumstances: (1.) She had ringworm; (2.) Two of her brothers or sisters had whooping cough; (3.) Three children of lodgers in the same house had measles; and whether the terms of the Education Act are enforced so as to encourage the neglect of proper precautions against the spreading of infectious diseases?

VISCOUNT SANDON: My attention, Sir, has been directed to the statement in The Times, signed "George Beavis," as it is directed, I need hardly say, to all similar statements. I have no means of ascertaining whether such statements are correct, and I have no authority whatever to interfere with school boards in the administration of their compulsory bye-laws, or with the magistrates in their adjudication upon the cases arising under them. I am sure, therefore, my hon. Friend will understand that I cannot express any opinion on the case to which his Question refers. As far as my information goes, I believe that the terms of the Education Act are not generally enforced so as to encourage the neglect of proper precautions against the spreading of infectious disease; if any cases of such neglect should occur, I trust the sanitary authorities will at once interfere to prevent such a perversion of the Act.

MR. BOORD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that George Beavis, the person referred to in the preceding Questions, who was convicted of a misdemeanor under the Education Act at Clerkenwell Police Court on the 10th November 1875, was refused the means of communicating with his friends, compelled to wear the prison dress and have his hair cut on arrival at Coldbath Fields Prison, and in all respects treated as a felon; and, whether any compensation will be offered to him for having suffered such indignities, and if he will take steps to prevent their recurrence?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I believe that the facts of this case are accurately stated in the hon. Member's Question with one exception—that is to say, that the prisoner was not refused the means of communicating with his friends. It appears that it is not the practice of the police court to keep messengers to take messages for persons who may be committed, but the police are always ready to forward any communication which prisoners may desire to send to their friends by any of the policemen who may happen to be about the office. In the present case it unfortunately happened that the prisoner was brought up late in the evening, when no one was available for taking his message to his friends. I am bound to say that I deeply regret the circumstances of this case. I know that what was done was done according to strict law; but I am quite sure that the House will agree with me in saying that if this is law it is not equity. I may state that it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill this Session for the purpose of relieving persons under such circumstances from being subject to treatment of this character.

MR. BOORD reminded the right hon. Gentleman that he had not stated whether it was the intention of the Government to give Beavis any compensation for the treatment he had received.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: We cannot give compensation merely because the magistrates have enforced the law.

THE SUEZ CANAL COMPANY—THE STATUTES AND BYE-LAWS.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in addition to the Concession and Statutes of the Suez Canal Company, which he promised yesterday, he will lay upon the Table the "By-laws of the Company and the resolutions adopted by general meetings of the shareholders," to which the possession of shares obliges the English nation to adhere?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was unable at so short a Notice to tell the noble Lord whether he should be able to comply with the request contained in his Question, but he would make inquiry into the subject.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE CIRCULARS. QUESTION.

MR. WHITBREAD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to lay upon the Table Papers relating to the Fugitive Slave Circulars beyond those referred to in the Return yesterday, especially any correspondence and despatches which might throw any light upon the reception and treatment of fugitive slaves? He also begged to remind the hon. Member that the First Circular was not included among the Papers referred to.

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that all Papers relating to the subject had been in course of preparation for some time, with the view of their being placed before the Royal Commission. Since the Notice of the Question of the hon. Gentleman had been given, orders had been issued by the Department that the Papers should be prepared as early as possible, in order that they might be placed in the hands of hon. Members before the Motion of the hon. Gentleman came on for discussion. Of course, the First Circular would be printed with the other Papers.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (LORD HENRY SOMERSET) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

"I have received with much satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address.

"You may rely on My hearty co-operation in all measures best calculated to promote the happiness and contentment of My People."

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

EAST INDIA (CHRISTIANITY).

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

MR. O'REILLY, in moving for an Address for certain Papers relating to the position of Roman Catholic chaplains in India, and the numbers of Christians of all denominations, expressed his surprise that his Motion should not have been allowed to take the form of one for an unopposed Return. As early as the year 1833 a solemn pledge was given that Her Majesty's Christian subjects of all denominations in India should be placed upon a footing of perfect equality. Up to the present date that pledge had not been redeemed, a circumstance, which, he thought, was hardly creditable to those in power. For many years the Roman Catholic soldiers in Her Majesty's Army in India were without a chaplain of their own religion to minister to them, and although lately something had been done in the matter the state of affairs was still very unsatisfactory. As an instance of the injustice that was committed he might mention that while the Roman Catholic chaplains were paid only at the rate of 100 rupees a-month, rising gradually to 300, the Anglican chaplains were paid at the rate of 500, rising to 800. Surely that alone was a crying injustice and inequality. Further than that, there was not a sufficient number appointed. Nor could ignorance be pleaded for such a state of things. Complaints had been repeatedly made to the Indian Government with reference to the great inequality of these payments, but without any result. The subject had been fully considered by the Indian Government, all the correspondence relating to it had been concluded, and the country had a right to have a copy of the correspondence in order that it might be able to judge whether the Indian Government was justified in making no alteration with reference to these salaries. He asked for the Returns on this subject nearly nine months ago, and he wished to know why they had not been given? He wanted to see from these Papers why justice had not been done in that matter, and whether, even if to do justice it should be necessary to cut down existing establishments, it might not be proper to consider that alternative. Those Papers, though they were State, and therefore public property, had been withheld. The matter had been before the Indian Government since 1870, and it was high time that the Papers, which would enable the public to judge of the matter, should be produced. What, in short, had been the course of proceeding on the part of the Indian Government in this matter? In 1870 the whole question was brought under their notice by Lord

Mayo and nothing was done. In 1872, he, himself (Mr. O'Reilly) brought the subject under their notice in a letter addressed to the then Secretary of State, the Duke of Argyll, who was confident that there would be no undue delay in ascertaining the views of the Indian Government. In August, 1872, the Indian Government said that they would reserve their opinion, until they could go into the whole matter. In August of the following year he (Mr. O'Reilly) made applications on the subject again, but still nothing was done. Again and again the Indian Government were applied to, but they did nothing. They did, he believe, decide, but they decided to do nothing, and did not choose to announce that decision, and finally, last year, he gave Notice of his intention to ask for the Papers. The India Office undertook to write out to India and ask the Indian authorities to send those Papers to this country. On the first day of the Session he made further inquiry, but got no answer until that day, when he received a courteous communication from the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for India (Lord George Hamilton) saying that there had been some delay, which he could not account for, in hearing from India. He must now ask the House to insist on an answer from the Indian Government with respect to those Papers, of which he believed there was not one that could not be produced. The first paper for which he asked was the Circular Letter of the Governor General in Council to Local Governments, dated 14th August, and the 2nd November, 1872, calling for Returns of numbers of Christians in congregations, salaries of ministers to same, &c., and Returns to the same by Local Governments. A very distinguished Member of the Indian Council promised to take up this question, but yet we were without the required information. A local Indian paper quoted from a Memorandum of Lord Mayo on the subject of Roman Catholic chaplains this remarkable expression—"The present state of things is anomalous and difficult to defend." He (Mr. O'Reilly) asked for that Memorandum of Lord Mayo, dated 2nd December, 1870. He also asked for the despatch of the Governor General in Council to the Secretary of State, dated 21st December, 1870; and for the Minutes by Members of Council on the question of the position of the Roman Catholic clergy in India, dated 15th and 22nd of June, 1872. He (Mr. O'Reilly) supposed the terms of that despatch to be to the following effect—"The question of the reduction of the number of ecclesiastical chaplains in India is now receiving our earnest attention, and we hope to be soon able to lay before you our views on this subject." The next Paper he asked for was Minutes by Members of Council on the same subject, dated 16th December, 1873, and 10th March, 1874. He wanted to know the opinion of the Indian Government on this subject. Suppose they held the "levelling down" principle, and that the reduction of the Anglican establishment in India was the right course, and that another form or religious instruction should be substituted, ought we not to know the reasons? He also asked for the Memorial of the Most Rev. Dr. Stein, delivered to the Government of India on this subject, and some letters of his own addressed to the Indian Government. The Indian Government did not choose to answer, and that was the reason for their silence. Let it be supposed that the answer of the Indian Government was practically this—"We will say nothing at all, until directed by the Secretary of State. If levelling down is then suggested from England, we can think of it afterwards." That, he feared, was the real explanation of the Indian Government with regard to the judicious silence which they had maintained from year to year; and the answer of the House of Commons to that ought to be given by a note calling for the production of the Papers.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of—

"1. Circular Letter of Governor General in Council to Local Governments, dated the 14th day of August and the 2nd day of November 1872, calling for Returns of numbers of Christians in congregations, salaries of ministers to same, &c., and of Returns to the same by Local Governments;

"2. Memorandum by Lord Mayo, dated the 2nd day of December 1870, on position of Roman Catholic Chaplains in India;

"3. Despatch of Governor General in Council to the Secretary of State, dated the 21st day of December 1870;

"4. Minutes by Members of Council on the question of the position of the Roman Catholic

Clergy in India, dated the 15th and the 22nd days of June 1872;

"5. Despatch of Governor General in Council to the Secretary of State, dated Simla, the 19th day of August 1872;

"6. Minutes by Members of Council on same subject, dated the 16th day of December 1873 and the 10th day of March 1874;

"7. Same by same, dated the 2nd and the 22nd days of July 1874;

"8. Memorial of Most Rev. Dr. Stein's delivered to Government of India;

"9. Minutes by Members of Council on Dr. Stein's Memorial dated the 19th day of October and the 9th day of November 1874;

"10. Letter and Memorandum addressed to the Secretary of State by M. O'Reilly, Esq., M.P., dated the 28th day of October 1875;

"11. And, any further Correspondence on same subject between Secretary of State and Government of India or M. O'Reilly,"—(Mr. O'Reilly,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he would at once admit that the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) had pressed the question of the position of Roman Catholic chaplains on the India Office with great consideration. The remarks of the hon. Member naturally divided themselves into two parts—first, the grievance under which the Roman Catholic chaplains were said to labour, and secondly, the reasons which could be adduced for the production of the Papers. When the present Ministry was formed they found that a despatch as to those Papers had been sent out to the Indian Government in 1872, to which no answer had been received, and Lord Salisbury had twice since then addressed the Indian Government on the matter. Last year, when the hon. Gentleman moved for those Papers, he (Lord George Hamilton) told him that, though some of them were at the India Office, there were others which he had never seen, and therefore it would be impossible for him, as the Representative of a public Department, to promise their production. The Papers which the hon. Member moved for from the Government of India were Memorandum Minutes, which were often of a private character, and could not be produced; and he had said last year, that before he could consent to the production of those Papers he must communicate with the Government of India. The India Office pressed the Government of India very shortly after last Session, and expected a reply. About six weeks ago they received a despatch from the Government of India asking them to send an enclosure which appeared to have been omitted from the despatch. That was sent on the 15th of January, and he felt when the hon. Member placed his Notice on the Paper that it was due to him to telegraph to India for a reply as to which Papers might be presented. In answer, he had that day received a telegram to the effect that the Papers would be forwarded without further delay. There was not the least wish on his own part, or on the part of the Secretary of State, to keep back these Papers; but he could not pledge himself to produce them until he had seen them, which he hoped very soon to be able to do. There was one portion of the telegram from the Indian Government which would be satisfactory to the hon. Member who had moved for these Papers. The hon. Member had said that the pay of the Roman Catholic chaplains rose to 300 rupees, whereas it only rose to 200. He (Lord George Hamilton) did not seek to deny that there was a great discrepancy between the position of the Roman Catholic chaplains and the Anglican chaplains. But it was to be borne in mind that the Roman Catholic chaplains in India stood on a different footing from the Established Church and Presbyterian chaplains. In this matter, in fact, the Indian Government might be said to pay by results. [Laughter.] That perhaps might not be a very reverent term, but he had not intended to use it irreverently. The hon. Gentleman declared that the position and status of the Roman Catholic chaplains was not what could be wished, but it ought to be remembered that many of them were not English, and could not even speak English; and the work they performed for the troops and white subjects of Her Majesty was not their only work, for they also acted as missionaries. The Duke of Argyll had pointed out the broad distinction between the position of the clergy of the Churches of England and Scotland and that of the priests of the Church of Rome in India; the former being bound to obey the orders of Government, and the latter only the orders of their spiritual superiors. That explained the great disparity which doubtless existed between the salaries of the chaplains of the Established Church and those of the Roman Catholic chaplains. With regard to the telegram, the portion to which he had just referred stated that the Indian Government had determined to increase the allowances of the Roman Catholic chaplains. Their number at present was about 76, and they received payments varying from 100 to 200 rupees per month. It was now proposed that 20 of not less than 15 years' service should receive 300 rupees a-month, and that 24 of not less than seven years' service should have 250 rupees, and that the remaining 32 should get 200 rupees per month; while it was further suggested that they should receive in addition a service allowance of 30 rupees per month. It was evident, therefore, that the position of the chaplains would be very considerably improved, the minimum allowance under the scale about to be adopted being the maximum at present. With regard to the Papers, he could assure the hon. Member for Longford that as soon as the despatch of the Indian Government was received, and if there was no objection, they would at once be produced. The hon. Member might meanwhile move for a Return of the Papers that were already in the hands of the Government, and to the production of which there was no objection, and wait for the reply of the Indian Government with respect to the others.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that as to the production of the Papers, he could not congratulate the Government on the rapidity of their communications, seeing that it took them six years to obtain as much information as private enterprise in the public Press could obtain in a few hours. With regard to the proposed increase of the allowances of the Roman Catholic chaplains in India, it would only raise their pay about one-third of what the Established Church and Presbyterian chaplains were getting. The first class might have a little more, but the second and third classes would still have less pay than subalterns had, and it could hardly be said that that was a fair position for these chaplains to occupy. Nor was it quite fair to say that they were not in the service of the Government, and that they obeyed only the orders of the heads of their Church. He was aware, from personal observation, of the services which they performed in the Army, and knew of instances in which their chaplains had applied to the commanding officer for permission to hold Bible services. It was true that they would not obey the Commander-in-Chief on a question of doctrine or sacrament; but he should like to see the Commander-in-Chief interfering in that respect either with Established Church or Presbyterian chaplains. As to some of them not being natives of England, some of the soldiers complained of the want of chaplains from other countries who could speak the language of those countries. If the Government would agree to pay them at the same rate, or at nearly the same rate, as the ministers of the Established Church or Presbyterian Church, while they were servants of the Crown, they would accept that compromise.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would bear testimony to the excellent service of the Roman Catholic chaplains in India, and to their readiness on all occasions to go where their services were required in the face of danger and death. No doubt they were formerly very poorly paid and lived poorly. Their position, however, had been improved, and it was to be improved still further, and he was not in favour of placing chaplains of any persuasion in India too much in the position of highly-paid clergymen at home. They often did better in the position of independent ministers. He favoured a levelling down policy of reducing the number of very highly-paid chaplains entirely at the service of the Crown, and trusting more to the many zealous ministers of different denominations in India.

MR. O'REILLY said, he would accept the suggestion of the noble Lord, and withdraw his Motion.

COUNCIL OF INDIA (PENSIONS).

RESOLUTION.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in rising to move a Resolution in reference to the Council of India (Pensions) on which to found a Bill for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of State to appoint certain professional men—not exceeding three—as his advisers, said, it had for its object the removal of an inconvenience resulting from the mode of appointing Members of the Council. Under the Act of 1858 Members were appointed to the Council of India for life, and were entitled to a pension of £500 a-year after 10 years' service. It was, however, afterwards found desirable to limit the appointments to 10 years. But it was absolutely essential that the Secretary of State should have upon that Council certain professional advisers, and the inducement at present was not sufficient to attract eminent lawyers. The proposed Bill would give the Secretary of State power to appoint Members of the Council who would have the same privileges as they would have had under the original Act of 1858; but the tenure of office would not last more than 15 years, and the number so appointed could not exceed three. He did not consider this an extravagant proposal.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he was glad to find that the Bill differed from the proposal made last Session. It omitted the section which provided for superannuation to the Auditor of Indian Accounts, who was now understood to have had his rights to superannuation recognized prior to his transfer from the Home Civil Service to the India Office. But it was only right that the portion of service spent in the Home branch should bear the share of the superannuation which might be awarded on the completion of his duties as Auditor. The charges for pensions to officers and soldiers of the Army were graduated in ratio to the years and days served in India and in the direct service of the Crown. It was, therefore, only fair to India that the superannuation, when granted to the gentleman appointed Auditor, should, on the same principle, be divided between Imperial and Indian Revenues in proportion to the years respectively served under the two Governments. This new Bill was, however, of great importance, for it made a great change in the conditions on which appointments were to be made to the Council of India. Under the Act of 1858 no one could be appointed to the Council who had not served in India for some years, and the Act of 1869 continued that condition. The present Bill, however, provided for three Members being appointed to the Council, without the condition of India service. Such a change as that ought not to be made without the fullest information being laid before Parliament as to the causes which had led to the change. Looking, also, to the exclusive way in which offices in the Imperial Service were restricted to those who had actually belonged to that Service, it did appear a most unusual course to pass laws by which those who had spent their life in the service of India should have the few openings for service at Home diminished in favour of those who had no claims and might have no motives for protecting the interests of India. This change also provided for pensions being granted to these three Councillors, and if report could be relied on, the learned and talented gentleman who was now on the Council was likely to benefit by this new law; and what was most objectionable, the law was to have retrospective effect, so as to cover his service in the Council, notwithstanding the intentions of the Legislature, which, under the Act of 1869, were understood to have excluded all new Councillors from the right to pensions. On these grounds he felt it his duty to oppose the Bill.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of the Revenues of India, of any Pension that may be granted to any Member of the Council of India.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the Valuation of Property for the purposes of Rates and Taxes, said, during the Recess, at many of the meetings which had been held, expectations were held out that, at the commencement of this Session, the Government would be prepared to lay upon the Table what was called a comprehensive measure of reform as regarded local taxation and local government. Without pausing to inquire what was the exact meaning of the somewhat ambiguous phrase "a comprehensive measure," he might take that opportunity to repeat the few observations which he made last year on a similar occasion. He yielded to no man in his sense of the pressing importance and growing interest of questions of this kind, and he held they had taken on the public mind. He had had the subject under his careful attention the whole time he was in office, and he had lost no opportunity of bringing the questions involved under the notice of the Government. He did not, however, think it was reasonable to expect that anything like what could be called a comprehensive measure on this question could be expected from that or any other Government at present, considering the crowded condition of the Business of the House. It seemed to him much more practical and satisfactory to proceed by degrees to improve and simplify the system to which he was alluding, and he hoped in the course of the present Session to have several opportunities of making substantial progress in that direction. They all knew that important alterations were required in regard to the collection, the assessment, and the administration of local rates, and all admitted the necessity of bringing together the present scattered and sometimes conflicting areas of local administration. But he must point out that at the foundation of all these questions lay the necessity of simplifying the law as regarded the valuation of property for rating and taxing purposes, and he did not stand alone in his opinion that a Valuation Bill was an essential preliminary to all other improvements. When this question was discussed at considerable length in the newspapers, he was struck by a letter which appeared in The Times, written by Sir Edward Kerrison, formerly a Member of that House, and possessing the confidence of, and accepted as a representative man among, landlords and tenants. What did he say? He said—

"I venture again to call attention, through your columns, to the undoubted fact that no satisfactory solution of this great question can be reached until all rates and taxes are levied on one basis. Even if a subsidy be given by Parliament in relief of local taxation, it cannot be fairly distributed while the rateable value of the same property in different Unions varies from 10 to 40 per cent.

Successive Governments during the last 10 years had entertained that view, and there was not a time at which during that period a Valuation Bill might not have been found in the pigeon holes of the public offices. So long ago as 1867 a measure was brought forward by his right hon. Friend the present First Lord of the Admiralty proposing to unite for purposes of valuation the functions of the surveyor of taxes with those of overseers of parishes and assessment committees; but it was afterwards withdrawn for want of time. In 1869 his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) was successful in carrying through a most excellent measure of reform in this respect, applicable only, however, to the metropolis. That Act had now been in operation for seven years, and two valuations of the metropolis had taken place in accordance with its provisions. The Act was so comprehensive and complete in its character that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), when he proposed a Bill on the subject, stated by way of Preamble the expediency of extending to the whole Kingdom the provisions of that measure. Last year the Bill which he (Mr. Selater-Booth) now proposed to lay on the Table was in a forward state of preparation, and might have been introduced had an opportunity offered for its consideration. Not only had the public Departments, public officers, and members of various Governments shown their appreciation of the necessity of this measure, but while he had been in office he had received communications from different parts of the country, and various public authorities, as well as private individuals, all illustrating the fact that there was now in the public mind a general conviction of the necessity of proceeding in this matter. He had an elaborate statement from a gentleman in Norfolk, complaining that in 22 Unions of that county no two bodies adopted the same principle of deduction in arriving at the rateable value, and he had also a complaint from a gentleman in Devonshire, who mentioned that there had been no fresh valuation of his parish for 40 years. He had heard from other quarters, too, a general desire expressed that reforms should be made with a view to coming at a more accurate and just valuation. Two days ago he received letters from chairmen of important local boards in Lancashire, expressing an opinion as to the great difficulty of arriving at the real value of property for the purposes of local rates. Again, within the last few days, he had met a deputation of gentlemen, representing ratepayers of Swindon, where the growth of property had been great, and they informed him that, in consequence of the impossibility of exercising any control over the operations of the assessment committee, there was a belief that equal justice was not dealt out to different ratepayers of that town. He need not remind the House that there was in every parish in the Kingdom a rankling sense of injustice on the part of at least one important ratepayer — namely, the clergyman in receipt of the tithe rent-charge. Although he did not see his way to giving all that relief which many hon. Gentlemen would desire, he thought that, if only with the view of doing justice to the clergy, some means should be adopted in order to insure that all the ratepayers were assessed equally and more in accordance with the real value of the property. The clergy had associated themselves together for the purpose of getting some redress on frequent occasions; but he believed that those who were wisely advised did not desire, beyond one small matter, that any special provision should be made for them, merely wishing that fair measure should be dealt out to all classes of the community. When he came to the question of county rating, he must confess there was no uniformity whatever with regard to securing that the payment made should be uniformly assessed. In some counties great expense had been gone to in special valuation which might well have been avoided had this Bill been in existence. In the county to which he had the honour to belong, by constant attention to the subject, the county rate had been well kept up to the mark; but, on the other hand, he had heard a statement recently with regard to Gloucestershire to the effect that in many cases the assessment remained much as it was 10 or 20 years ago. He had not taken the trouble of going into the cases of the other counties, but he was sure that they would show a like state of circumstances. Now, in order to cure those inequalities which were complained of, not only by experts, but also by the public at large, it was proposed now, as it was before, and as was already the law in the metropolis, that a Government officer—namely, the surveyor of taxes—should be a party to the preparation of the valuation lists. The exact mode in which his functions were to be brought into play was rather different from what had been proposed on previous occasions. He was to be associated with the overseers in the necessary preliminaries to the preparations of the lists, and was also to be an authority in fixing the amount at which the gross value was to be returned. This, it might be said, was but a small change to give occasion for a Bill of upwards of 100 clauses; but the real fact was, that there was no need of any great changes, provided only they could insert into the machinery that was provided the influence of the surveyor of taxes. The Union Assessment Committee Act was, and had been, an exceedingly good measure, and might be and was in many parts of the country worked with great assiduity and success. It would be remembered by hon. Gentlemen who had gone into the subject at length that Mr. Poulett Scrope—a high authority on these subjects—originally drew his Bill so as to secure that individual ratepayers in a parish should be rated equally, and the object of the Union Assessment Committee Act was that that principle should apply to Unions. The object of the present measure was not only to secure more uniform action amongst assessment committees for that particular object for which they existed, but to secure that the contribution of Unions to county rates should be also fairly assessed; and it would be of immense advantage that the assessment for the property and income tax and the local assessment should be made at the same time, both as giving additional security to the ratepayer, and conducing to the success of the valuation, and also reducing the number of inquisitorial demands made on the ratepayers as to their property and the value of the hereditaments they possessed. As he had stated, the Union Assessment Act was remarkably well worked in some parts of the country, and there would be no occasion to interfere with it if it were equally well worked in all. As an illustration, he would mention that he had been informed by an authority he could not doubt that one of the largest properties mentioned in the Return upon the Table of the House—one of the largest estates in the Kingdom—was given so accurately, both as to acreage and value, that the gross value taken from the rate-book, between £70,000 and £80,000 a-year, was within a fraction of the sum received by the owner of the estate; and that fact was due to the strict carrying out of the provisions of the Union Assessment Act. It might also be mentioned as evidence in favour of the Act that the deductions made in order to ascertain the annual value averaged 15 per cent over the whole Kingdom. The variations were, however, considerable, as between purely agricultural districts and districts near to great towns, the latter having the advantage of the former. Thus, in Northumberland and Huntingdon the average was 9 per cent; whereas in Surrey and Kent it was 19 per cent. The Bill he asked leave to introduce was in a great degree a consolidation of the Metropolitan Valuation Act of 1869 and the Union Assessment Committee Act. The provisions of the former Act had been slightly varied in some unimportant particulars, and there were some improvements in the mode in which the surveyor of taxes was instructed to proceed. He was to be associated with the overseer from the first, before the preparation of the list; and during the early part of the year that which had proved to be a great difficulty in the assessing of the gross valuation would be got rid of. The appeals under the Bill were, in the first instance, to a special sessions, and ultimately to the quarter sessions. The special sessions would for the most part decide cases in which individual ratepayers were interested; the quarter sessions those in which Union complained against Union or county against Union. There were provisions in the Bill for securing the rights of ratepayers in the event of notices not being properly given to them, so as to secure that they should not be ousted from any redress they might be entitled to. An important alteration was proposed with regard to the periods of valuation by extending them to every seven instead of every five years, as now in the metropolis, and he felt satisfied that any slight loss that might arise to the revenue by delaying the valuation would be more than compensated to the Government by the increased accuracy of the valuations then made, and the increased attention that would be given to the annual supplementary and provisional valuation lists, and the result would be that the same term would hereafter apply to the valuation for the property and income tax. It would be a very great change in favour of the taxpayer and ratepayer that a very unpleasant process would require to be gone through only once in seven years. It was proposed that the assessment of tithe rent-charge should also be made once in seven years, and not be varied from year to year as it now was, and a statutory enactment would be placed in the Bill that for the purposes of valuation, where the circumstances of the parish required it, the salary of the curate should be deducted from the income of the rector. Taking into consideration the satisfactory manner in which the Metropolis Valuation Act had worked, he thought there would be no objection on the part of the local authorities to be associated with a public officer in this particular work, or that there need be any apprehension that the valuation would thereby be pushed up unduly, and to any unreasonable extent. That was not the intention of the Government, as was shown by the proposal substituting seven for five years. He would go further, and say that as far as he was informed—and he had taken great pains to inform himself—the association of the surveyor with the local authority in the metropolis had been a successful experiment. It was quite true that during the summer of last year the newspapers were full of remonstrances from individual ratepayers who conceived themselves to be surcharged beyond what was reasonable. He had no doubt that in many cases those remonstrances had been well founded; but he had the best reason for thinking that the supervision of the surveyor of taxes in the valuation which had gone on during the last year had been quite as much of a mediatory character as the reverse; and he could quote instances to show that such was the case. The process, therefore, would not, he thought, justify the views of those who might be alarmed at the change proposed. On the contrary, it would, he believed, be found to be rather of a soothing than of an irritating character. The intervention of the Government in matters of valuation in Ireland, he would remind the House, had been the rule for local and Imperial purposes. In Scotland, that was not quite the case, but very nearly, the Government valuation being, to a great degree, the valuation for local purposes in that country. Although he listened with some sympathy to those who objected to a Government officer participating in this local work, yet they should remember that the circumstances had very much changed since the question was last before the House. The Government was now by far the largest ratepayer in the country. Subventions were made by the Government in aid of local rating in every Union and county, and it was the bounden duty of the Government to see that the valuation of properties was effectually and fairly carried out, and it was the duty of Parliament to see that the Government did not pay subventions which were not in aid of charges rightly and strictly levied upon all the ratepayers of the country. He should ask the House to read his Bill for the first time on the following grounds:—firstly, because it was absurd that the same property should be valued three times by three different authorities for the purposes of taxation; secondly, because it was unjust that the basis of the common contributions to the county funds should be based upon widely differing scales of deduction; thirdly, because the principle of the central Government acting in matters of assessment and valuation had already been adopted with satisfactory results in the metropolis as well as in Scotland and Ireland; and lastly, because the Bill embodied an improvement of the law which might pave the way to very important changes in the local administration of the country. He could foresee the time when it might be expedient to do for the counties what had already been done for the metropolis—namely, to spread over wider areas than at present the incidence of some items of local taxation, and so to reduce and mitigate the burden which at present pressed most grievously upon the poorer class of taxpayers. That that could be done without breaking up the integrity and independence of local administration had been shown by the experience of the metropolitan system during the last 10 years. Whether a time would come when his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to make use of the means proposed in the Bill for the purpose of assessing the property tax upon rateable value he did not know; but if the rateable value column could be made use of for that purpose there would be much greater satisfaction in the payment of the tax, and the Government would be relieved from much anxiety, trouble, and expense, as well as from the animosity of the taxpayers, arising from a sense of injustice under which they now supposed themselves to suffer in being assessed for the property tax upon their gross receipts. Beyond that, the convenience resulting from having but one Valuation Act for the metropolis and the whole of the country would undoubtedly prove a great advantage in the end. He hoped the House would be so forbearing as not to rip up the provisions of a law which had already worked well, or to occupy time in discussing clauses in the present Bill which really contained no new matter. The proposals of amendment were trifling in point of extent, if not in point of meaning and intention, and he therefore hoped the House would see its way to dealing with the measure in the shortest amount of time consistent with a due consideration of the important points involved. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by formally moving for leave to introduce his Bill.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, so far as it went, was very satisfactory. The complaint of last Session was, that it was a blank on these matters, when they were led to suppose that the subject of local taxation would have engaged the attention of Parliament and the Government. He therefore hoped that as there was a very small programme of domestic measures before Parliament, this Bill would receive a full and fair consideration, and, with such modification as might be found necessary, passed into law. The necessity for simplifying the law of assessment lay at the root of the whole question, for it was ridiculous that three different systems should prevail for dealing with the same property, and as the Government proposal was aimed at achieving this object there was the more reason for accepting its proposals. It was satisfactory to know that the Bill passed for the metropolis had worked so well. He doubted if it would be satisfactory in every case; but he was glad to hear there was some reason to believe so. It had been held that the introduction of a Government surveyor of taxes into the provisions of a Bill like the present was objectionable as tending to centralization. He personally had no strong objection to the principle of centralization, and should certainly be inclined to accept it if it was combined with relief of local taxation from Imperial sources. He accepted the statement of the right hon. Gentleman with the more satisfaction because it showed the intention of the Government to redeem one, at least, of the pledges which they made while in Opposition, that this subject would receive their immediate attention. The point to which those who pleaded the cause of the local taxpayer chiefly looked was the additional assistance which was to be obtained from the Imperial Exchequer towards local purposes, but that had been generally treated as the last portion of the subject to be dealt with. He hoped, however, now that the Government had brought in a Bill applicable to one branch of the question, they would not intermit their exertions, but endeavour to deal with the most important part of it during the present Session.

MR. MUNTZ said, he could not agree with the hon. Member who had just sat down in thinking that the House would be willing to abandon the principle of local self-government and independence, simply because some small amount of relief was afforded to local taxation from Imperial funds. He therefore hoped that the Bill would not have the effect of overriding parochial government, though it was capable of improvement; and, further, that before a revolution was commenced, some principle would be laid down in the Bill upon which the new valuations and assessment should be made. At present the greatest possible differences existed in the allowance made for tear and wear and other deductions from the gross value of property in neighbouring parishes where the valuations were made in reference to the original cost; while in many places large and costly houses were let at a merely nominal rental, and were assessed upon the basis of real lettable value. The injustice was so great that he must be allowed to express his surprise that some such measure was not brought forward years ago. Now, however, that it had, he trusted that care would be taken to lay down some rule by which this injustice would be prevented, and that equal uniformity should be enforced. If that were done, he felt sure hon. Members on both sides of the House would do all they could to assist the right hon. Gentleman in carrying such a measure.

MR. FLOYER, while expressing his satisfaction that the Government had introduced the measure with the view of giving relief to the local ratepayers, said, the modes of valuation to which the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had referred were contrary to the statute law which had been in existence many years, and, as expounded by the Judges, laid down the only sound principle—namely, that property should be valued according to what it would let for. He therefore thought the right hon. Gentleman had done wisely in avoiding the laying down of any new principle for the valuation of property, but had laid before the House the simple and sound proposal that property should be valued according to the same principle as heretofore. He doubted whether, because a certain system of valuation of property could be carried out without difficulty in the metropolis, such a system of valuation would be equally applicable to the country generally. Nothing could be more different than the nature of property in London and that of property in rural parishes. The overseers who were employed in valuing property in London had a considerable amount of official character, had had a great deal of experience, and were a very different class from the rural overseers. He was afraid, therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman talked about associating the surveyor of taxes with the rural overseer, that the latter would go to the wall whenever any difference arose between them, because it was impossible that he could hold his own as well as the overseer of the London parish, who, with his experience, was more than a match for the surveyor of taxes. It would not be right to ask the right hon. Gentleman to go into minute details in introducing a measure of this kind; but it appeared to him that the practicability of associating the surveyor of taxes with the overseer would depend upon what position was secured to each of those officials in carrying out their duties. If he understood the right hon. Gentleman correctly, he proposed to classify appeals against the valuation with the view of sending one set of appeals before the special petty sessions and the other set before the quarter sessions. He did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to mean that all appeals were to go first to the special petty sessions and from thence to the quarter sessions, but that they were to be classified according to their particular character, only one appeal being allowed. He did not know why one appeal in such cases should not be sufficient, and the only difficulty would be to which of the Courts of Appeal the cases should be sent. He thought that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman that the salaries of curates should be deducted from the income of rectors and vicars for the purposes of valuation was a mere act of justice, although he did not know exactly the circumstances under which that allowance would be made. The right hon. Gentleman said that that principle of reduction in the assessment of clerical incomes had been adopted in some parts of the country, although from a recent decision of the Courts it seemed not to be justifiable in point of law. He had thus followed the sense of the country as to what was fair and just in this matter. Hon. Members would look forward with interest to a fuller statement from the right hon. Gentleman when the Bill came on for a second reading, because, in a matter of this kind, so much depended upon details. He thought, on the whole, that the House had shown a general disposition to agree with the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman, and that the sketch which the right hon. Gentleman had given of his Bill had been satisfactory. Under these circumstances he should be prepared to give the right hon. Gentleman his best assistance towards carrying this measure.

MR. STANSFELD said, he agreed with the remark that had fallen from the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Floyer), that all discussion upon the measure should be reserved until the second reading, because it was at all times highly inconvenient to attempt to discuss a Bill which they had not seen, and with the provisions of which they were not fully acquainted. In fact, he should not have risen on that occasion at all had it not been that the right hon. Gentleman had, not exactly thrown out a challenge to him, but almost invited discussion upon a somewhat wider issue than that involved in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had, at the commencement of his speech, given the House to understand that this measure was to be a part fulfilment of the expectations which Her Majesty's Government had raised with reference to the relief that was to be given to local taxation, and he pointed specially to the possibility of a time arriving when taxation would be lightened by being spread over a wider area. He did not think that he should be doing much service to the public or to the House by taking advantage of that observation of the right hon. Gentleman in order to raise a discussion at the present time as to whether Her Majesty's Government had by this measure sufficiently fulfilled the expectations it had raised on this subject. He wished, however, to remove an impression under which the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke) evidently laboured, and which was, that, as to this measure, Her Majesty's Government did not intend to come before the House, as their predecessors had done, with a proposition that any contributions to the relief of local taxation should be postponed until after a reform of the local government had been effected. He could not accept that statement as an accurate representation of the views of the late Government upon this question. The truth was that in 1873 he had introduced three Bills—one a Rating Bill, the principles of which the present Government had practically accepted and passed into law; the second a Valuation Bill, on the lines of which the present Bill had been drawn; and the third a Bill for the Consolidation of Rating for the convenience of collecting rates. The late Government had, indeed, declared that Session that they were not prepared to vote the money out of the Imperial Exchequer for the relief of local taxation until the work of that Session had been accomplished; but, nevertheless, the Government was undoubtedly pledged to give in one shape or another relief to local taxation. The right hon. Gentleman would recollect that the then President of the Poor Law Board had introduced a very wide measure, one leading feature in which was to give relief to local taxation. Under these circumstances, he felt bound to say that it was no part of the theory of the late Government that relief to local taxation was to be postponed until local administration had been reformed.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the presence at last of the Bill whose advent had been so long expected. In his opinion, it was far easier to carry through a measure of this kind in a comprehensive form than to pass it piecemeal for counties and divisions of counties, and then to endeavour to reconcile the conflicting systems which would grow up under separate administration. He differed from those who thought that a new principle of valuation ought to be introduced. The sound principle had been laid down in the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act. With regard to the period at which a new valuation should be made, he would have been better pleased to see "five" remaining in the Bill, because it was rather a serious thing to fix upon anybody an erroneous valuation which could not be disturbed for seven years. The right hon. Gentleman spoke truly of the very great advantage of having one basis of valuation and one rating authority instead of three—he (Mr. Hubbard) might say, instead of 13, for in the Metropolis alone there were 13 different rates levied. The consolidation into one uniform system of these conflicting means of levying rates must be very beneficial both as regarded economy of administration and the absence of the recurrence of the demands made upon the taxpayer. He believed the apprehension was quite unfounded that Englishmen would lose their independence if they were not allowed to assess their property. He thought the system of self-assessment had been grossly abused, and that the country would be far better satisfied if men of responsibility appointed by the Crown were made the medium of determining what was the value of property. In carrying out a system of single assessment we should get not only a single basis, but also a single expression of value both for local taxation and for Imperial taxation. Opportunity would be given for further remark when the clauses of the Bill appeared before the Committee, and he would only add the expression of his gratification at the announcement that the country clergy would get some relief. He trusted that this would be an occasion upon which Her Majesty's Government would not allow the demands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be inferior in accuracy to those of local bodies throughout the country, but that they would have one and the same system, thus securing equality and simplicity of action and contentment on the part of the taxpayers.

SIR JOHN SCOURFIELD thanked the right hon. Gentleman for introducing a measure on this subject. Although he was quite ready to give every assistance in his power to make the measure a perfect one, he was not quite so sanguine as some might be. The difficulties were enormous, and he was a little disturbed at the present moment by the appearance of that very extraordinary document which now arrested the attention of half the Kingdom. He alluded to that book which had been somewhat romantically called Domesday Book. An hon. Friend of his in that House had spoken of it as The Money Lenders' Guide, while others called it The Mothers' Manual. All he (Sir John Scourfield) could say was that if either the money-lenders or the other more interesting class of the community trusted to that manual for estimating the wealth of individuals upon whom they had designs, he feared they would be woefully deceived. Many persons would be surprised to see their names attached in it to such an infinitely greater amount of wealth than they believed themselves to be the possessors of. He trusted that whatever valuation was made under this Bill it would be conducted on a more intelligible principle than the valuation in that book. However that might be, he earnestly desired that this measure should lead to a successful determination of this subject.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to know whether the alteration of "five" to "seven" with regard to the number of years at which a re-valuation should be made would be extended to the metropolis? It would be scarcely fair that the metropolis should be re-valued every five years, while other places were re-valued every seven years. With regard to the principle of this Bill he had only to express his satisfaction at the handsome language in which the right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the Metropolitan Valuation Act, which he (Mr. Goschen) had the honour of introducing. Occupants of the Treasury Bench, when they quitted their places, did not always receive compensation for unexhausted improvements. Therefore, he could only express his satisfaction that in this case acknowledgment had been made. The late Government thought they put a good deal of stuff into the ground, and if the result should be a rich crop of legislative measures, they would certainly not complain, but congratulate their successors upon them. At the same time, they hoped the measures would follow each other with reasonable despatch, and that the present Government would not act upon the plan of the Queen in the Arabian Nights, and so extend their legislative story as to make it last for ever. There was a Consolidation and a Rates Bill which was perfectly ready to the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. He hoped the House would not have to wait two years for the appearance of that Bill, as they had to wait two years for the appearance of this Bill; but that the Government would produce that and other measures which were ready to their hands as soon as possible.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, after thanking the House for the kind manner in which his Motion had been received, said, in reply to the question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) that the metropolis would be spared for, he believed, eight years from a fresh valuation. The number of appeals this year in the metropolis to the special sessions under the right hon. Gentleman's Act was very trifling. They amounted to only 120, although he believed the number of assessments was upwards of 500,000. That spoke a good deal for the operation of the Act. In reply to the observation of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), that hon. Gentleman would find an important clause in the Bill establishing a relation between actual rents and values which he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) hoped would be satisfactory. In reply to the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Floyer), it was not the case that special sessions were constituted the final Court of Appeal for the ordinary ratepayer, but, as a matter of fact, he had no doubt that would be generally the result. Appeals of primary importance would go to the special sessions; those of secondary importance to quarter sessions.

ARMY—MILITARY PRISONERS—CASE OF GUNNER CHARLTON.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether compensation has been made, as promised last year in the House by the Secretary of State for War, to Gunner Charlton of Topsham Barracks, Exeter, crippled for life by frost-bite while undergoing solitary confinement as a prisoner at Millbank Prison; and, if so, what was the amount of the compensation in annual pension or fixed gratuity?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I cannot quite admit the correctness of the Question of the hon. Member. Gunner Charlton cannot be pensioned until discharged; and he is still in hospital at Exeter, where he will remain until less inclement weather admits of his being sent before a Discharging Board at Devonport. His case has been laid before the Chelsea Board, with a strong recommendation from me, in accordance with what I alone promised—namely, "without entering into the merits of the case, I would recommend that something should be done for the man after leaving the hospital." The Secretary of State is not empowered to order or promise compensation in such a case.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—EXAMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

• DR. LUSH asked the Secretary of State for War, If the changes in the Army Medical Department, indicated in his speech towards the close of the last Session of Parliament, are likely soon to be carried out?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, there were three Questions on the Paper in reference to the subject, and, in answer to them all, he might say it was perfectly true that at present there were 40 vacancies in the Army Medical Service and that there were only 12 candidates for them. The examination of candidates which ought to have taken place that day had therefore been deferred. He had laid before those Departments which must be consulted before he could bring any measure under the consideration of the House, a proposal which he believed would remedy a great many, if not all, the present difficulties in connection with the Army Medical Department.

INDIA—THE DISTURBANCES IN THE MALAYAN PENINSULA—THE PAPERS. QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table Papers showing the cause of the recent disturbances in the Malayan Peninsula, and the Orders of Her Majesty's Government on the subject?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, Papers upon this subject will shortly be laid upon the Table, though their production is temporarily delayed in order that certain important despatches may be added. Amongst these is one from Sir William Jervois, now on its way home, and which he has specially requested may be included amongst the other Papers.

POST OFFICE CHEQUES.—QUESTION.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will facilitate the sending money through the Post Office, either by the sale of cheques for a limited amount at the different branches, or by some other method by which the trouble and high charges of the present Money Order system may be avoided?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the subject was now undergoing the careful consideration of the Government.

POST OFFICE—THE NORTH AMERICAN MAIL CONTRACTS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Postmaster General, If notice has been given to terminate the contracts with the Cunard and Inman Companies for carrying the Mails between this country and North America; and, if he can now state what new arrangements were to be proposed for conducting the service?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the notices in question were delivered on the 11th of August last, and he hoped soon to be in a position to state what the new arrangements would be.

THE "MISTLETOE" COLLISION—BARON BRAMWELL.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Mr. Baron Bramwell has ever been officially asked whether in his charge to the Jury on the "Mistletoe" inquiry he had used the words ascribed to him by the newspapers of the day (or words of anything like similar import), these words being "a verdict against Captain Welch would give great pain to Her Majesty;" and "as Englishmen would you not be proud to think that the Queen travelled at a greater pace than anybody else;" and, whether he can inform the House what was Mr. Baron Bramwell's reply?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No, Sir, I have not thought it my duty to make any official inquiry into this subject. Since the Question of the hon. Member was placed upon the Paper, however, I have communicated with the learned Judge referred to, and I hold in my hand a letter from him. With reference to the last part of the Question, I have to state that the five or six words quoted in the Question bear a very different interpretation standing by themselves from what they do when read in connection with the rest of the learned Judge's language. With regard to the first words quoted in the Question, I have distinctly to state, on behalf of the learned Judge, that he not only did not say what he was supposed to have said, but that he said the negative of it. He "cannot but say that he was supposed to have said what no Judge on the bench could possibly have said," and he "cannot understand how he could be believed to have made use of those words."

ARMY—THE MILITARY SCANDAL AT HYTHE.—QUESTION.

MR. SANDFORD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Commission issued to inquire into the Military scandal at Hythe?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, it is not because there is anything to conceal, but, on general principles, it is not considered expedient to place the proceedings of Courts of Inquiry on the Table of the House. There was no Commission.

MR. SANDFORD gave Notice of his intention to call attention to the subject on the Army Estimates.

ARMY—THE BARRACKS AT OMAGH. QUESTION.

MR. HENRY CORRY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state when the building of the barracks for the Depôt Centre at Omagh will be commenced?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, alterations to the existing barracks at Omagh, for the purpose of the Depôt Centre, have been in progress for some time, and are nearly completed. The arrangements for proceeding with the construction of certain additional buildings which are required are in a forward state, and it is hoped that they may be commenced in the course of the next few months.

ARMY—THE COMMISSION ON PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, When it is likely that the Report of the Royal Commission on Promotion and Retirement in the Army, which was assembled in November 1874, will be laid before the House?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he was sorry he was unable to give the hon. Gentleman the information he asked for. The Commission had been very actively engaged on the subject, but the actuarial calculations would take a longer time than was expected. He hoped the Commission would be able to report in the course of two or three months; but, of course, he was not able to say until that Report had been received what course he could pursue in regard to it during the present Session.

INDIA—DEPRECIATION OF SILVER—THE INDIAN CIVIL AND MILITARY SERVICES.—QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the attention of the Indian Government had been directed to the loss sustained by Members of the Indian Civil and Military Services (when transmitting money home to their families), in consequence of the depreciation of the exchangeable value of the rupee; and, whether it is contemplated to propose a gold currency for India, or to take other steps to remedy the grievance complained of?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the attention of the Secretary of State has been drawn to the depreciation of the exchangeable value of the rupee, but the rates at present allowed to members of the Civil and Military Services considerably exceed the rate at which the Secretary of State can obtain remittances from India. In fact, the grievance is not against the Indian Government, but against silver which will insist upon depreciating itself. There is no intention at present to alter the currency in India, and it would be very difficult—if not impossible, for the Secretary of State to make any further concession to these officers, as the depreciation of silver largely increases the expenditure of the Indian Government.

ARMY—THE CONNAUGHT RANGERS.

QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is an intention on the part of the Military authorities to permit the 88th Regiment (Connaught Rangers) to serve in Ireland prior to their proceeding on Foreign service, over thirty years having elapsed since the Regiment was quartered in Ireland, and considerable expense being incurred by Irish privates in the Regiment when proceeding on furlough to that country to visit their relatives?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I am happy, Sir, to inform the hon. Baronet that his patriotic wishes will be gratified, and that in the ordinary course the 88th Regiment will go to Limerick and New Ross in the course of the present year.

EDUCATION — THE FACTORIES ACT, 1874—EXAMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is true that the Inspectors of Factories are instructed to disregard Clause 12 (the Educational Clause) of the Factories Act 1874, and that children are being passed daily as full-timers contrary to the Act, without being subjected to any educational test; and, if so, who is responsible for the same?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that a Minute was presented to the Education Department at the end of June, and the Act would have come into operation at the proper time, as fixed by the Act itself, but the recommendations for the granting of certificates did not appear to have been fully understood. He was happy to say, however, that arrangements were now being made by the Education Department to enable persons to be examined immediately in the great centres of industry, so that no further difficulty need be experienced in putting the Act into operation.

INDIA—THE EXCHANGES.

QUESTION.

MR. BECKETT DENISON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If the Secretary of State in Council has it in contemplation to review and revise the present system of drawing bills of exchange upon India each month, whereby a loss of two million pounds per annum is sustained by the Indian Exchequer, or a sum equal to the interest at 4 per cent, of a public debt of fifty millions?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The Secretary of State, Sir, does not at present intend to alter the system of drawing bills of exchange upon India, but he is quite prepared to adopt from time to time such measures as may appear to him likely to lessen the loss on exchange, and he will be glad to consider any practical suggestion which my hon. Friend or any other authority may have to make to him. The loss of £2,000,000 per annum, spoken of by my hon. Friend as sustained by the Indian Exchequer, is chiefly one of account. Previous to 1857 the rupee was always estimated at 1s. 10½d., but for convenience of account it has since been estimated at 2s.; and the loss accruing, placed under the head of "loss on exchange." No doubt, loss to the Indian Government has been caused by the accumulation of silver.

CHURCH BODIES (GIBRALTAR)—THE ORDINANCES.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Ordinances which have been prepared for constituting and endowing Church bodies for the Anglican and Roman Catholic communities at Gibraltar?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, it was not usual to lay before Parliament the draft of measures which were under consideration; but, in this instance, if his hon. Friend would like to see the ordinances to which he referred, he (Mr. Lowther) would be glad to show them to him if he would be so good as to communicate to the Department on the subject.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to legislate on the subject of intermediate education in Ireland during the present Session?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : Sir, it is difficult at present, at this early period of the Session, to give a definite reply to the Question. I fear, however, that there will not be sufficient time at the disposal of the Government to enable me to introduce any measure on the subject.

SEAL FISHERY.—CLOSE TIME.—INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. YEAMAN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether Her Majesty's Government have been able to make any arrangements for the establishment of a close time in the Seal Fishery off Greenland?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, that arrangements under the Act passed last Session had been made by Her Majesty's Government for the establishment of a close time in the Greenland Seal Fishery, which would have been in operation during this season's fishing. A day or two ago, however, information was received by telegraph that Norway, who is largely interested, is unable to legislate in time for this year's fishing, and as the arrangements, to be of any value, must be international and mutual, the Government have been most reluctantly compelled to rescind the arrangements they had made. There could, therefore, be this year no restriction imposed on the time for commencing the capture of Seals.

NAVY.—H.M.S. VANGUARD.

QUESTION.

MR. PARNELL asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the wreck of the Vanguard is silting up with sand; and if so, whether he has any information as the extent of the silting up; and, if the Admiralty, in any contract entered into for the raising of the ship, has reserved power to itself to take steps, prior to the expiration of the time allowed for the completion of the contract, to prevent the wreck from becoming a permanent obstruction to navigation?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that by the last report he had received, which was dated the 22nd January, it appeared that the Vanguard had sunk vertically into the sand to the extent of 9½ feet since the 11th of September. If any contract were entered into for the raising of the vessel power would be reserved to the Government to terminate such contract in the event of the rate of progress not being satisfactory, and to take any necessary steps to prevent the vessel being any obstruction to navigation, and if the ship were not raised the masts would be removed.

SHERIFFS COURTS (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

MR. FARLEY LEITH asked the Lord Advocate, If it is his intention to re-introduce the Bill for extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs Courts in Scotland, which was withdrawn last Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: In reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I have to state that it is my intention to introduce a Sheriffs Courts (Scotland) Bill, with provisions similar to those in the Bill of last year. I hope to have an opportunity of doing so soon.

PRISONS (IRELAND).—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is proposed to extend to Ireland the promised legislation for the better management of prisons?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the course proposed in the Question of the hon. Member would be taken, and he had prepared a Bill on the subject, which he hoped to be able shortly to introduce.

THE SUEZ CANAL COMPANY—THE BYE-LAWS AND STATUTES.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in addition to the Concession and Statutes of the Suez Canal Company which he has promised to lay upon the Table of the House previous to the discussion on the purchase of shares, he will also lay upon the Table of the House "the Bye-laws of the Company and the Resolutions adopted by the General Meeting of the Shareholders," to which the English nation is bound by the possession of shares?

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he thought his noble Friend had been misled by the use of the word "bye-laws." There were no bye-laws in addition to those included in the Concession and in the Statutes of the Company. There were, of course, a certain number of resolutions that had been passed at the General Meetings of the shareholders; but the majority of them were merely of a formal character, which it was not desirable to trouble the House with, but in preparing the copies of the Concession he would take care that any important resolution which might have been passed should be added to it.

INDIA—TENDERS FOR BILLS ON BOMBAY.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN W. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Why the Secretary of State has refused to accept tenders for Bills of Exchange on Bombay to the extent of 7,000,000 rupees, which have been advertised for?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the India Office advertisement of the 10th of November, 1863, the terms of which are by the advertisements now issued applicable to tenders for bills on India provides that "the Secretary of State will not be bound to accept any tender." On the 2nd inst. tenders were accepted to the amount of 17,50,000 rupees at 1s. 9½d. and 1s. 9¾d the rupee, all other tenders at lower rates being, in the exercise of the power referred to, rejected. Application was subsequently made that the accepted tenders might be cancelled on the ground that by a clerical error the rates had been wrongly stated, the figure "8" having been substituted for "9," and the Secretary of State, being satisfied of the accuracy of that representation, consented to cancel the tenders.

THE MINISTER OF WAR IN EGYPT.

QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF begged to ask, Whether it is true that General Pettie is to be appointed Minister of War in Egypt; and, whether that gentleman is a Russian officer, and one of the leaders of the Pan-Slavic party in Russia?

MR. BOURKE requested the hon. Member to repeat his Question on some future day.

SLAVERY AND THE SLAVE TRADE— FUGITIVE SLAVES—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—NOMINATION.

MR. DISRAELI: I will announce to the House the names of the Gentlemen whom Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint as a Royal Commission to inquire into Her Majesty's engagements with other States and other matters connected with Slavery. They are the following:—Duke of Somerset; the Lord Chief Justice of England; Sir Robert Phillimore; Mr. Justice Archibald; Sir Henry Holland; Sir George Campbell; Sir Henry Maine; Mr. Fitzjames Stephen; Mr. Rothery; Right Hon. Sir Mountague Bernard; Rear-Admiral of the Fleet, Sir Leopold Heath; and Hon. Alfred Thesiger.

SUPPLY—THE SUEZ CANAL SHARES.

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have to submit to the Committee that a Vote of a sum not exceeding £4,080,000 be granted to Her Majesty to enable Her Majesty to pay the purchase-money for shares which belonged to the Khedive in the Suez Canal, and the expenses attendant thereon. The explanation of this Vote is in the printed Paper which is in the hands of hon. Members; and I will shortly state the effect of that explanation. His Highness the Khedive, having proposed to sell the whole of his shares in the Suez Canal to Her Majesty's Government for £4,000,000, Her Majesty's Government accepted the proposal. His Highness the Khedive's shares were supposed at first to be 177,642, the number formerly belonging to him; but it was subsequently found that in consequence of his having sold some of them, the number was only 176,602. A reduction corresponding with the reduced number of shares was therefore made in the purchase-money, bringing it down to £3,976,582. The Messrs. Rothschild undertook to pay this sum to the Khedive, and in consideration of their trouble and risk it is agreed that the Government will pay them 2½ per cent commission on the purchase-money, or £99,414. A small balance to make up a round sum is added in order to meet any additional expenses which may have been incurred. That arrangement, which is referred to in this Paper, was come to by Her Majesty's Government, as the Committee are aware, in the month of November last; and we have taken time before calling the attention of Parliament to the subject. An opinion has been expressed in some quarters that we should have done better to have advised Her Majesty to call Parliament together immediately the bargain had been made; but I think that, upon reflection, most persons will be satisfied that, independently of the inconvenience which is always attached to summoning Parliament unexpectedly in the winter season, there were reasons which made it better that the discussion of the subject should not be hurried forward. The matter was one which took the public, at all events, both in this country and abroad, by surprise. There was some natural excitement at the announcement. It is probable, from the opinions which were expressed—I may say in almost every quarter—at the moment of the announcement that, as far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned, if they had met Parliament immediately on the completion of the transaction, they would have received a very cordial and enthusiastic support. But I cannot help thinking that complaints might not unreasonably have been made on the part of some hon. Gentlemen that they had not had time to consider so grave a matter; and perhaps, when the first enthusiasm had subsided, a regret might have been felt that more opportunity for full consideration had not been afforded. There was no constitutional reason for the immediate assembling of Parliament; and, therefore, the opportunity has now been given, both to Members of this House and the country at large, to consider this question in all its bearings; and I hope that the discussion which will no doubt occur on the proposal of the Vote to-night will be of a more searching and more thorough character than could possibly have been the case in the month of December. Sir, the great difficulty I feel in bringing this Vote under the notice of the Committee arises from my sense of the large mass of information which we have at our disposal, and the great range of subjects over which it would be possible for me to travel, and my unwillingness unnecessarily to detain or to confuse the House by going into all the details which naturally suggest themselves to me. I will endeavour, as far as I can, to condense what I have to say, and avoid going over ground which is already familiar to the Committee. If I omit any points I shall have the opportunity, I hope—or, rather, Members of the Government will have the opportunity—of supplying whatever may appear to hon. Members to be defective. Therefore, I will proceed, as concisely as I can, to lay before the Committee the leading features of this transaction, and the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to take the course they have pursued. Now, the great enterprize of the Suez Canal is one which from its first inception has attracted the attention of this country. It has been the subject of much criticism and of many doubts. There were great doubts, in the first instance, whether the enterprize was one that could possibly be accomplished. There were doubts whether, if accomplished, it would be of any advantage to England. There were doubts also whether, in the event of its being carried through, it would not produce political consequences which might be disadvantageous to this country. And the result was that the Parliament and the Government of England held aloof at the beginning of the undertaking from assisting in its commencement; and not only held aloof, but discouraged—and, perhaps, it may not unfairly be said, to some extent impeded—the operations of the projector. I think that subsequent events have shown that this is one of those cases in which the old saying applies—that incredulity also has its dupes, for I cannot help thinking that if the English nation had taken a somewhat different line on the first commencement of the undertaking, some of the disadvantages which have been experienced of late years might have been avoided. However, the doubts which were felt—and honestly and very naturally felt—with regard to this enterprize have been gradually dispelled under the influence of facts. The Canal has been made, has been opened, and has been proved to be of great advantage to England; while as respects the political inconveniences that would result from it, they are, at all events, as yet undeveloped. The Canal, at any rate, is a fact; and I wish to call the attention of the Committee now to the position of the undertaking, and of the Company by which it has been carried through. We all of us, when we speak of this great work, most justly pay the first tribute of respect to the name of the projector, M. de Lesseps, and I am most anxious to speak with full and entire sympathy and admiration of that gentleman. I am anxious also to do justice to another whose share in this enterprize is, perhaps, somewhat left out of sight, and yet it was not an inconsiderable one. I refer to the Viceroy of Egypt, and when I say the Viceroy of Egypt, I wish to be understood as speaking not only of the present Viceroy, but of his predecessor, Said Pasha. It was through the hearty and energetic co-operation of these two great and eminent personages that this undertaking has been brought to the condition of success which it has attained. I wish to call the attention of the Committee briefly, as my subject to-night is mainly a financial one, to the financial position of the Company, and to the connection of the Khedive of Egypt with it from a financial point of view. I have seen in the public papers and elsewhere very interesting and elaborate accounts of the financial position of the Suez Canal Company; and hon. Gentlemen who have read the various articles and letters which have appeared both in the English and the foreign newspapers must, I think, unless they are very familiar with the details of such accounts, have become a little perplexed with the great complication of the different classes of capital and classes of obligations, and the different relations between the different kinds of securities with which we have been so abundantly supplied. I have endeavoured, as well as I can, to obtain a concise opinion upon the actual position of the Company, and with the assistance of the able gentlemen who compose the financial Department of the Treasury, I have obtained some analysis of the position of the Company. Even so, it is far too long and too complicated for me to trouble the Committee with it; but I can give them in a short form one or two of the results to which it leads. The capital of the Company—what may be called the open capital—was £8,000,000 sterling, and, in addition to that £8,000,000 of capital of the Company, there have been created bonds for the accrued interest of the shareholders during the time when the receipts were not sufficient to pay that interest, though the Canal had been opened and the work was in operation, to the amount of £1,360,000. Therefore the capital of the Company is placed at £9,360,000. In addition to that the Company raised loans of £4,480,000, making together £13,840,000. Now, I find that they have charged to capital, as having been expended on works, about £15,000,000, and that, moreover, they have paid in interest charged to capital about £4,000,000 more, making a capital expenditure of £19,000,000. But they only raised £13,840,000, and the difference between what they have raised and what they have expended amounts to £5,160,000—a sum which was almost entirely provided in one shape or another by the Viceroy of Egypt. Moreover, the Company are in possession of lands granted to them by the Khedive which, after all they have had to surrender, are worth about £4,000,000. Again, the Committee will remember that at the commencement of this undertaking the Viceroy of Egypt, besides the direct pecuniary aid he gave to the Company, agreed to supply them with labour upon cheap terms—forced labour, in fact. That labour was supplied for several years, but ultimately, in consequence of objections taken to the system, that assistance was withdrawn and compensation was paid to the Company for its

loss. But up to the time of the withdrawal a considerable amount of labour had been contributed by the Khedive. This amount, on a rough calculation, may be taken at £400,000. Moreover, the Khedive having forestalled the payments made by him under the Emperor's award, made no charge for discount, thus virtually contributing a further sum to the Company which may be taken at £350,000. These sums, added together, amount to £4,750,000, so that we may say the Khedive, besides taking the shares, supplied the Company with nearly £10,000,000 of money or money's worth. It is almost superfluous to point out that in some respects the Canal has been a disadvantage to the Khedive, inasmuch as it competes with other modes of transit from which he obtained some profit; and it may be a question, indeed, whether he has not found the Canal a direct pecuniary loss. But I do not dwell upon that. I only point out that in one shape or another the Company have received large advantages from the Khedive, from which he gets no return. Well, what has been the result? The result to the Khedive has been, as I shall presently point out, embarrassment. To the Company the result, which is not unsatisfactory, has been this. They have, as I have pointed out, in the shape of lands, assets of about £4,000,000; their loan liabilities amount to £4,480,000. Therefore, their assets, if realized, are pretty nearly sufficient to balance their liabilities. Thus they have their capital disengaged and their net profits, whatever they may be, available for dividends. Well, now I may be asked, What are these net profits and how far is the Company solvent and successful? Upon that point I think the figures, and they are very few, which I shall mention to the Committee, show the Company in a pecuniary sense to be making very satisfactory progress. I have here a statement of the business of the Canal, taken from the Company's annual reports for the years 1870-74, that for 1875 not having yet come to hand. I will only trouble the Committee with the net results in each year. In 1870 there was a deficit of £383,570. The following year the deficit had been reduced to £105,700. In 1872 the deficit disappears altogether, and there is a small surplus of £82,851. The fourth year the surplus amounts to £299,397, and during the last year it has risen to £322,343. I believe the result for the present year is likely to be more favourable still, and that it is such as to show that the Company are in a prosperous and satisfactory condition. Now, with regard to the importance of the Canal to this country, I will just call attention to the number and tonnage of British ships passing through it. I find that these figures have been advancing with very great rapidity. In the first of the years I have just mentioned, 319 British ships, with a tonnage of 291,000, passed through the Canal. Those numbers steadily advanced year by year, till in 1874 we find the number of ships 898, and their total tonnage 1,209,000. The following year the number of ships appears as 884, and their tonnage 1,221,000, and by the end of this year probably 1,500,000 of British tonnage will have passed through the Canal. Without going into further details, these figures show very conclusively that the Canal is of no small importance to British commerce. I will just add this one fact—that the proportion which British tonnage bears to foreign appears for last year and the year before 73 per cent, to which it had increased from 67 per cent in the first year. But I do not think I should be quite doing justice to the advantages which this means of communication confers upon us if I did not also lay before the Committee a very remarkable statement made to me on the part of the India Office. I will take the liberty of reading to the Committee a short extract from this memorandum—

"The Suez Canal was opened on the 17th of November, 1869. Its influence on our relations with India is twofold—administrative and commercial. The administration has greatly benefited by the additional facilities afforded for the transport of troops to and from India. Instead of the service being conducted with two vessels plying between Southampton and Alexandria, and three between Suez and Bombay, the ships are now sent the whole way to and from India. By this course it is possible to make ten instead of eight voyages every season, and consequently to convey 25 per cent more troops; while, when—as happens this year—the number of the reliefs is somewhat reduced, the whole service can be performed by four instead of five ships, the other being kept in reserve at small expense, or lent to the Imperial Government. During the summer also there are five instead of two ships at home to meet any emergency. The disembarkation and re-embarkation of the troops and their baggage in Egypt is avoided—a point of very great importance in the case of women and children, and especially of invalids, who used to be sent round the Cape in order to escape the trials of the land route. The ships can be easily and more economically examined in England, and any repairs or improvements effected, instead of their having to be brought home specially round the Cape. The necessity for maintaining the full complement of officers and men in all the ships during the summer is removed, and a great reduction effected in the expenditure for repairs, stores, mess, and provisions; while the coal depôts at Suez and Aden have been given up, and the stock at Bombay greatly reduced, a measure resulting in a large saving, since the freight of coal to Port Said is much less than the cost of conveying it round the Cape to India or the Red Sea. The hospital at Suez has been abolished, and the staff both at that place and at Bombay reduced. As regards the despatch of stores to India for the use of the Government, the convenience of the Canal is very great. It is true that the charge for freight is very high, owing to the employment of steamers and to the heavy Canal dues; but there is a great practical gain in consequence of the much shorter time within which the stores can reach India in case of emergency, on the one hand, and the longer time afforded for obtaining them economically when there is no great hurry, on the other. Under the former system the cost of sending stores overland through Egypt was very heavy, when pressing necessity led to the adoption of such a step."

The memorandum goes on to discuss the commercial advantages of the Canal; but I will not detain the Committee on this head. I have preferred to point out its administrative advantages, because I think this is a matter in which we are not merely interested for the sake of trade and commerce, but also with respect to our communication with our Indian Empire; and when the question is asked whether there is any use in making a sacrifice to keep open the road to our Eastern dominions, and whether we are only thinking of time of war and the mode of providing against a possible interruption of this communication, I cannot help reminding the Committee that there is an important public service continually going on between England and the East in time of peace, and that it is of great importance that we should make the best provision we can for securing an uninterrupted passage to India and our Eastern possessions. It has been said that what we should have to do in time of war as the owners of a certain number of shares would be precisely what we should have to do if we did not own shares at all—that is to say, we should have to use force. But I am not contemplating times of war when we might have to resort to force. I am speaking of times wholly independent of European complications. I will point out to the Committee one advantage of great importance to us which we gain by having free access to this passage. Some hon. Members may remember a difficulty which arose some years ago in relation to one of our colonies. They may remember that there was an insurrection on the Red River, and that the Canadian Government had occasion to send troops from Canada to put down that outbreak, and a difficulty arose in sending those troops because they had to pass through a canal, which was closed against them, being under foreign influence. The same kind of difficulty might arise on an occasion of our having to send troops to the East in a matter in which no European Power was interested. We might have to send troops to suppress a mutiny in India or to take part in operations in some portion of the East, and it is of very great importance that we should not be liable to be stopped by difficulties if we can prevent them arising. I am aware, as I have just heard said, that the purchase of the shares would not prevent it, but I shall deal with that point presently. I will return, if the Committee will allow me, to the history of the Canal. It was started under circumstances of difficulty and discouragement; and although the enterprise was completed, for the first few years, as the statement just read will show, it was not financially profitable; and, moreover, there were fears entertained that the Canal would cost a great deal more to keep it in order than had been reckoned upon, and that large and costly works would have to be undertaken in order to maintain the access to Port Said. Consequently the Company were anxious to take some steps which would enable them to improve their receipts. M. de Lesseps came over here. He was anxious to seek co-operation in England. His feelings towards England with reference to the Canal were not altogether satisfactory; but M. de Lesseps, although he might feel more or less pleased with England—although he might feel more or less of that jealousy which we attribute to Frenchmen, and which perhaps we have done something to provoke—was, at all events, in this case entitled to a great deal of praise. But whatever might have been his feelings on such points as these, one feeling I believe to be paramount in his mind, and that is, a feeling which the artist

the trials of the land route. The ships can be easily and more economically examined in England, and any repairs or improvements effected, instead of their having to be brought home specially round the Cape. The necessity for maintaining the full complement of officers and men in all the ships during the summer is removed, and a great reduction effected in the expenditure for repairs, stores, mess, and provisions; while the coal depôts at Suez and Aden have been given up, and the stock at Bombay greatly reduced, a measure resulting in a large saving, since the freight of coal to Port Said is much less than the cost of conveying it round the Cape to India or the Red Sea. The hospital at Suez has been abolished, and the staff both at that place and at Bombay reduced. As regards the despatch of stores to India for the use of the Government, the convenience of the Canal is very great. It is true that the charge for freight is very high, owing to the employment of steamers and to the heavy Canal dues; but there is a great practical gain in consequence of the much shorter time within which the stores can reach India in case of emergency, on the one hand, and the longer time afforded for obtaining them economically when there is no great hurry, on the other. Under the former system the cost of sending stores overland through Egypt was very heavy, when pressing necessity led to the adoption of such a step."

The memorandum goes on to discuss the commercial advantages of the Canal; but I will not detain the Committee on this head. I have preferred to point out its administrative advantages, because I think this is a matter in which we are not merely interested for the sake of trade and commerce, but also with respect to our communication with our Indian Empire; and when the question is asked whether there is any use in making a sacrifice to keep open the road to our Eastern dominions, and whether we are only thinking of time of war and the mode of providing against a possible interruption of this communication, I cannot help reminding the Committee that there is an important public service continually going on between England and the East in time of peace, and that it is of great importance that we should make the best provision we can for securing an uninterrupted passage to India and our Eastern possessions. It has been said that what we should have to do in time of war as the owners of a certain number of shares would be precisely what we should have to do if we did not own shares at all—that is to say, we should have to use force. But I am not contemplating times of war when we might have to resort to force. I am speaking of times wholly independent of European complications. I will point out to the Committee one advantage of great importance to us which we gain by having free access to this passage. Some hon. Members may remember a difficulty which arose some years ago in relation to one of our colonies. They may remember that there was an insurrection on the Red River, and that the Canadian Government had occasion to send troops from Canada to put down that outbreak, and a difficulty arose in sending those troops because they had to pass through a canal, which was closed against them, being under foreign influence. The same kind of difficulty might arise on an occasion of our having to send troops to the East in a matter in which no European Power was interested. We might have to send troops to suppress a mutiny in India or to take part in operations in some portion of the East, and it is of very great importance that we should not be liable to be stopped by difficulties if we can prevent them arising. I am aware, as I have just heard said, that the purchase of the shares would not prevent it, but I shall deal with that point presently. I will return, if the Committee will allow me, to the history of the Canal. It was started under circumstances of difficulty and discouragement; and although the enterprise was completed, for the first few years, as the statement just read will show, it was not financially profitable; and, moreover, there were fears entertained that the Canal would cost a great deal more to keep it in order than had been reckoned upon, and that large and costly works would have to be undertaken in order to maintain the access to Port Said. Consequently the Company were anxious to take some steps which would enable them to improve their receipts. M. de Lesseps came over here. He was anxious to seek co-operation in England. His feelings towards England with reference to the Canal were not altogether satisfactory; but M. de Lesseps, although he might feel more or less pleased with England—although he might feel more or less of that jealousy which we attribute to Frenchmen, and which perhaps we have done something to provoke—was, at all events, in this case entitled to a great deal of praise. But whatever might have been his feelings on such points as these, one feeling I believe to be paramount in his mind, and that is, a feeling which the artist has for the work of his own creation. He loved the Canal; he felt that his name was associated with that great work, and he had an earnest desire that that great work should not perish. He was anxious to secure the success of that work. He was ready to make friends with England. He was ready to go to war with England, so far as a director can go to war. He was ready to do anything to secure that which was necessary for the success of the Canal. Well, he came over here and he made proposals which were discussed with Her Majesty's Government of the time. The proposals were not made at a favourable time. The price of the shares was very low, and perhaps a little help at that time would have been acceptable; but the Government decided that they could not entertain the proposals which M. de Lesseps had made, so that they then came to nothing. M. de Lesseps then tried other measures; he tried to get the charge which he was authorized to lay upon vessels raised. Of course that was an attempt against which England was bound to protest, and a great deal of correspondence passed; a great many difficulties had to be encountered, and ultimately a conference was held at Constantinople. An arrangement was come to by the Representatives of the nations there assembled; and while M. de Lesseps was obliged to give way on many points with regard to which he advanced his contentions, at the same time terms were arrived at by which he was authorized to levy a certain limited amount of surtax on vessels passing through the Canal. The object of that surtax was to provide funds for the expenditure required for the Canal. M. de Lesseps was never satisfied with that. He protested against it, and he attempted some time ago to resist it. Of course, his opposition was overborne, but it was overborne by means which, I consider, it is undesirable to call into operation more often than can be helped—that is, by our invoking the assistance and active interference of the Porte and the Viceroy of Egypt. We were right in invoking that assistance, and they were right in giving it; and that is the ultima ratio to which you must have recourse when difficulties such as those with which we were met arise. But it hardly needs that I should show how unsatisfactory it is to invoke such interference more frequently than is absolutely necessary. Then the question still arises—what was the position of the concern, and what were the probabilities that it would be financially a successful undertaking, and what were the probabilities of any further large amount of expenditure being required? Upon that subject we have had—as our Predecessors have had—many causes for anxious consideration and reflection. I may say, for myself, I had not been in office many months when serious representations were made, and proposals involving questions of loans, questions of guarantees, and other questions were brought forward, all of which pointed to the probable necessity of some very large expenditure being required within a short time. I should like now to mention to the Committee that from the earliest period, I think, of these discussions, we have had the advantage of the assistance of a gentleman of very great ability and long connection with this matter—I mean Colonel Stokes. Colonel Stokes, who is an officer of Engineers, was originally employed on the Commission for the regulation of the navigation of the mouths of the Danube, and he has since been employed at the Suez Canal. It has been the practice of Her Majesty's Government to give him every facility on the subject and consult him freely and confidentially on every phase of the matter, so that he has been to us a very admirable book of reference upon all questions connected with the Canal. Now, of course, on this particular question of the physical condition of the Canal, Colonel Stokes's testimony would be of great value; and it is with very great satisfaction that I have found Colonel Stokes's reports as to the measures which have been adopted for dredging have of late been more and more cheerful, and that the probability of a very large outlay being needed for securing access to Port Said has become less and less. It is impossible to say what another year or two will bring forth; but as far as we can see at present, the opinion seems to be that it is not exceedingly probable that any very large or gigantic expenditure will be called for for purposes of that kind. We found that the Canal was in good order; we found that the difficulties with which it was threatened were at all events smoothed over; and at the beginning of last autumn those who had the success of the Canal at heart were in good spirits, and satisfied with the state of things. But in the meantime let us go back to the position of the Khedive. The financial difficulties of the Khedive had been continually increasing, as such difficulties are apt to do. It would not be correct to say that the expenditure in connection with the Suez Canal had been altogether the cause of these difficulties, but it had undoubtedly contributed towards them. The Khedive, who is a man of a very ardent temperament—very keen indeed to improve the condition of his country, and ready to expend money not merely upon frivolous luxuries, but upon works which are intended, and, under certain circumstances, are calculated to develop the resources of the country—had been outspending himself. The consequence was, he was pressed for money. Not only was that the case, but the financial administration of Egypt is in an unsatisfactory condition, and the manner in which his finances have been guided has not been such as to do fair and full justice to his resolves. The ready means which presented itself to him was to part with or mortgage the property which he possessed. There were always people ready to lend the money on terms very much more to their advantage than to his. There were people who would purchase his property, but on terms rather more favourable to the buyer than to the seller. Now, his property was not only important to him as the Ruler of Egypt, but it was more or less of international importance, consisting, as it did, of railways, and harbours, and other undertakings in a country which is on the highway of the world; and it was to be deprecated that the Khedive should divest himself of it, and that it should pass into the hands of those who would only desire to make as much money of it as they could. The Khedive, I would point out, has frequently parted with property at a moment of pressure at what I cannot help feeling was much less than its real value. Perhaps the circumstances of the moment were such that it could not be otherwise. Let me just give as an illustration the result of his parting with these coupons, of which we have heard so much, and of which we shall hear so much more. I mean the coupons on the shares which we bought. The Khedive found himself to be indebted to the Company in a sum of 30,000,000 francs. He had to raise that money, and the way in which it occurred to him to raise it was by cutting off the coupons of his 176,000 shares for twenty-five years and handing them over to the Company. The Company, in place of these 176,000 coupons, issued 120,000 délégations, of the same nominal amount (500 francs), but they issued them at the price of 270 francs. At that price the issue produced rather more than the required 30,000,000 francs. The holders of the délégations are entitled to the interest and dividends which the Khedive would have been receiving had he retained his coupons. But what is now the value of these délégations? They represent the property which the Khedive parted with in order to raise the sum of 30,000,000 francs, and they are now worth upwards of 70,000,000 francs; in that way, and by transactions such as that, it is obvious that the Khedive was rashly and hastily parting with his property in order to meet present necessities without reference to its future value. I must apologize to the Committee for going at such length into this subject. It may seem to be travelling out of the way, but I think it was necessary that I should make these few observations. I come now to the actual transaction which we are submitting to the consideration of the House at the present moment. In the middle of November my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs received some communications which led him to believe that negotiations were going on with the view of enabling the Khedive to raise more money by the sale or mortgage of his Canal shares. My noble Friend accordingly made inquiries, through our able Consul General at Cairo, for the purpose of ascertaining whether such was the case. It at once appeared to us that the transaction was one which was, for many reasons, undesirable. We were the more alive to the injury which would result to the Khedive from hastily pledging those shares, because, immediately before this, His Highness had asked the English Government to give him the assistance of one or two gentlemen from England in the regulation of his finances. That was a request which made us naturally feel more interest than would otherwise, perhaps, have been the case in the step which we found he was about to take.

We could not help feeling that, excellent thing as it might be to send out one or two of our best accountants to Egypt, it would be still more valuable to him when it appeared to us that he was about to take an unwise financial step that we should offer him our advice. The first impulse of the Government, therefore, was to counsel him not to raise money on those shares; but to give that bare advice without at the same time offering any alternative, we thought might be a course which, although it might be looked upon by His Highness as very kind and well meant, yet would at the same time be exceedingly futile. He would, perhaps, say—"I am in a position in which it is absolutely necessary for me, in order to avoid bankruptcy, to raise three or four millions of money within the next few weeks, and unless you show me some other way to do so, this is the mode in which I must proceed." Under these circumstances, we caused it to be intimated to him that if he desired to part with the shares, we should not be unwilling to enter into communications with him with the view to becoming the purchasers of them ourselves, if fair terms could be arranged. I will not trouble the Committee by going through the different stages of the transaction. The answer we received was that His Highness did not at the present moment wish to pledge the shares, but that if he should be disposed to sell them he would give the British Government the preference in the purchase. For the next 10 days we were in the constant receipt of intelligence, sometimes official, sometimes private, with reference to proposals which were being made to the Khedive for the purchase of the shares. Sometimes we were informed that the Anglo-Egyptian Bank was negotiating the purchase; sometimes the Société Générale; sometimes one thing and sometimes another; and we undoubtedly had good reason to suppose that something serious was going on with respect to them. In the meantime we did what we could to keep ourselves well informed on the subject by means of constant communication with our Consul General in Egypt. We repeated the proposal that the Government were willing to send a confidential agent, if necessary, to confer with the Khedive in regard to the shares. At length, on the 25th of November—I think it was—we received a communication which appeared to make it obvious that the matter had come to a crisis. We were informed that the Khedive had had a distinct offer of £4,000,000 for the shares, while he desired it should be intimated to us that he would give us the preference, and that we might have them at that price. I must pause here to correct a misapprehension as to a statement which has been attributed to my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He was represented to have said, in "another place," that the French Government were anxious to buy those shares; but what he said was, not that the French Government, but a French Company was desirous of making the purchase. I mention this because the French Government have taken notice of the misreport, and have asked me to say that they never did propose to make such an offer. I have now come to the point when the question presented itself for decision, whether we should or should not buy them ourselves. It may be said—I have heard it said—that we were over-alarmed, and that if we had held our hands a little, nothing would have come of the whole affair. From the communications which we received, however, it was perfectly clear to us that an offer for the purchase of the shares had been made, and we felt that if we had shrunk from the purchase, and had allowed the shares to get into the hands of a foreign country, we should have been reproached by England; and, I may add, we should have reproached ourselves. There are cases in which you must, after all, trust to the judgment of somebody. I can only say that we were fully alive to the responsibility of our position. We knew we were taking a step of a very novel and a very important character. We knew it was a step which would be looked upon with a very jealous and a very critical eye. We knew, besides, that if it happened to be a step which the country did not approve, the consequences to the Government would be of a nature which I need not further indicate. But we thought we should be cowards if we were to shrink from the responsibility of fulfilling the trust which had been committed to our keeping. We did not come to a sudden decision—that is to say, we did not come to a decision the first moment this proposal was made to us without a due knowledge of the circumstances of the case. We did not come to a resolution in the course of an hour or two. We had had this question of the Suez Canal for months and years under our notice, and we had had this special crisis under our notice for a period of more than 10 days. We had at our command information enabling us fully to understand what we were about, and we arrived at our decision deliberately. Now, what were the considerations which induced us to come to that decision? It may be said that it is all very well to point out that which nobody doubted, that this Canal is a very valuable highway for our commerce, and a most important road of access to our Indian Empire; but, after all, we shall be asked, what advantage is it to our interests to have become the purchasers of these shares in the Canal? Now, in the first place, we have to look, not only at the results of the step which we have taken, but at the alternative of what would probably have been the consequences if we had not taken it. Those shares were in the market, of that we were satisfied. If we did not buy them, somebody else would; and we had to consider what would be the effect of such a purchase. It is said that we have got shares which will bring us in no dividend, and which will only give us 10 votes; but, even so, is it not something to have prevented others acquiring so large a number of shares, which they might, perhaps, split up, and be desirous of bringing to account by offering them here and there? For my own part, I do not think it would have been desirable that we should have so great a voting power suddenly thrown into the hands of we did not know whom. I do not undertake to forecast the future of this Canal. Nobody can forecast it. It has been said that it may be bought up and thrown open to the whole world. Others have said that it may be converted into an international undertaking. Well, whatever might be the case, we should have to bear the lion's share of any price that would have had to be paid for it. And so, too, we should have had to do in respect of any international expenditure in connection with it. If works had to be constructed beyond the means of the Company for keeping up this important means of international communication, we, no doubt, should have to pay that 70 per cent, or whatever it might be, which was fairly attributable to our position as customers. These are matters which we had to take into account; but, above all, we had to consider the possible political consequences of leaving the matter open. We had no intention of turning the Canal into a political engine for our own purposes, but we were very desirous not to see it used as a political engine against us. We have been asked whether we look upon this purchase as the more important with reference to a state of war or of peace, and I, in answer to that question, say that I look upon the transaction as one of great importance for preventing complications and for preserving peace. But we are told that perhaps we did right in purchasing these shares, but that we have paid too dearly for them. I should like to ask those who say this whether they mean that we paid more than the shares were worth, or more than we might have been able to get them for if we had haggled for them and offered £1,000,000 or £500,000 less than it is proposed to pay? I very much doubt, looking at the position of the Khedive, and the fact that he had an immediate necessity for this particular sum of money, whether it would have been possible to obtain the shares on lower terms than those we were asked to pay. The Khedive would say—"I must realize this amount of money somehow," and he would have gone to some one else and got it on worse terms. I will now deal with the question of whether we have made so bad a bargain as in some quarters we are told we have. The noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) told us the other night that he had analyzed our purchase, and found that we had bought shares with a deferred interest for £2,000,000—for that was what he said they were worth in the market—and that we had lent the other £2,000,000 as a loan at an interest of 10 per cent. The process in which the noble Lord indulged reminded me of what some schoolboys do when they purchase knives—they say—"I give so much for the blade and so much for the handle." I prefer to look at the transaction as a whole; and if I have a right so to look at it, I may put the business in a light different from that in which the noble Lord regarded it. I should not be nearly as wide of the mark as was the noble Lord if I said that we have bought this valuable property at a price which will give it to us for nothing after a certain number of years; because, having agreed to pay £4,000,000 for the shares, we are to receive interest upon the purchase-money at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. If the House assents to the Vote now before it, it will in due time be my duty to propose the financial arrangements by which the purchase is to be completed. The nature of the arrangement which I shall propose will be that we should keep this transaction apart from the ordinary finance of the year; that we should raise a sum of money by means of a loan from the Commissioners of the National Debt, and that we should apply the £200,000 a-year to be received as interest on the purchase-money in payment of the interest on the loan and reduction of the principal, so that within a certain number of years—35, I think—we shall be entirely free of the payment, and shall have our property in the Canal for nothing. This will, of course, be conditional upon two things—firstly, that the Khedive continues regularly to pay his £200,000 a-year. [“Hear, hear!” from the Opposition]; and, secondly, that the Canal during the interval between the 19 and the 35 years continues to pay its 5 per cent of interest, which we have every reason to hope and believe will be the case. I will reply in a moment to the cheer which we heard a moment back from the benches opposite. When we are asked what we have got for our money, I reply that we have got two things. In the first place, we have got value for our money; and, in the second place, we have obtained influence in the administration of the Canal. We may be asked to explain the nature of the influence which we have acquired. To this question Lord Derby gave an answer which, perhaps, was sufficient, when he said—

“If anybody doubts that the possessor of two-fifths of the shares in this Canal obtains no influence, it is as difficult to argue with him as with a man who says that two and two do not make four.”

I must mention to the Committee that our influence will not be limited to the possession of 10 votes. The effect of this transaction has been the establishment of very friendly relations between

Colonel Stokes, the representative of Her Majesty's Government, and M. de Lesseps, one result of which has been that arrangements are in progress which will, we hope, lead to a settlement of the questions connected with tonnage dues, which have caused so much agitation, and also to the introduction into the administration of the Company of three representatives of England. Something has been said about the proportion of voting power which will be possessed by these representatives as compared with that of the other persons who will take part in the administration of the Company; but I would remark that it is not merely the number of votes they may possess which will give them influence, but the fact that they will be present as the representatives of England, and, as has been well said, votes in such cases are not only counted, but weighed. Then I come to the question of whether we shall get payment of the £200,000 a-year from the Khedive. I speak with some reserve upon this question, but I venture to say that I have every reason to think and to hope that we shall; I see no reason why we should not. It is very difficult for me to say anything upon this point without referring to another matter, upon which I am obliged to touch in the present condition of affairs, but regarding which the Committee will not expect me to say much—I mean, of course, the mission of Mr. Cave to Egypt. What I shall say on this question must be spoken with an amount of reserve, but it will be stated honestly and frankly. Papers which have been presented to the House fully show the origin of that mission, which, however, I may briefly state. In October last, before this question of the purchase of the Canal shares had arisen, the Khedive made application to Her Majesty's Government for the assistance of gentlemen or of a gentleman competent to assist him in the administration of his finances, and there was a disposition on the part of the Government to assist him, if possible. Such a request was not altogether unprecedented. It may be remembered that some years ago a somewhat similar application was made by the Turkish Government, and gentlemen were sent out to advise and report upon the financial position of Turkey. We were, as I have said, not unwilling to comply with the request of the Khedive if we were able to do so in a satisfactory manner; but, of course, we felt that it would be a very delicate thing for us to send out gentlemen who might carry with them something of the financial prestige of England to mix themselves up with the financial administration of another country, and especially of a country which was in some financial difficulty. This point was considered for some time, and the Treasury, to whom the matter was referred, informed the Foreign Office that while there was every desire to give the assistance asked, it was important that they should be fully informed as to what was to be the position, the functions, and the powers of those gentlemen who might be sent out. We also took the opportunity of saying that which is a fundamental truth in these matters—namely, that if the finances of a country are to be set straight, it is not to be done by having skilful accountants to manipulate matters of detail, or by adopting the best possible methods which have been elaborated by the wisdom of countries the most advanced, but there must be a determination on the part of the Government of the country interested to conduct its affairs in a sound, honest, and rigorously economical manner. There is little hope for a country which does not act upon these principles; and we thought it essential to point out distinctly to the Khedive the nature of the conditions on which alone any gentleman could be sent out to Egypt as requested, in order that we might be satisfied that we were not sending out any one on a mere fool's errand, or in the nature of a show director of a company, and so giving a false and fictitious character to the finances of Egypt. It appeared to us that the position was one of so much delicacy and importance that it would not be at all unworthy the occasion to send out a Colleague of our own—a Gentleman of high position, great experience, and mature judgment—who would command the confidence, as we believed, both of this country and of the Ruler of Egypt. I need not say to hon. Members of this House that there was probably no man we could have selected who combines these qualities so well as my right hon. Friend (Mr. Cave). He went out on instructions which are in the hands of hon. Members, and he was received in a very favourable manner by the Khedive. He was received with great friendliness, and was treated with great frankness. He was enabled by the Khedive to inspect everything that he chose to ask for, and, as far as it is possible to form a judgment, the information given to him was full and honest. I am not going—it would be wrong for me to do so—to state in anything like detail what the result of Mr. Cave's inquiries has so far been. I do not know that it would be right, under any circumstances, that the information he has collected and the reports he has prepared for the confidential advice of the Khedive, and which he has communicated confidentially to Her Majesty's Government, should be published. The mere publication of figures would probably lead to complications and controversies which I think ought to be avoided. However, I reserve my opinion on that point. At the present moment it is impossible to give anything like the particular results of the figures; but this I may say, that the general result of Mr. Cave's inquiries convinces us of three things. It convinces us, in the first place, that the resources of Egypt are considerable—that they have been rapidly advancing and developing. In the second place, it convinces us that the financial administration of Egypt is, or has been, to a considerable extent, bad; and, thirdly, it has led us to form the opinion that if the Khedive will pursue the course pointed out in the letter to which I have referred, if he will honestly and sincerely devote himself to the control of his expenses and to the cutting off not only of all unproductive expenditure, but even to the limitation of works which might be reproductive, but which are at present beyond the extent of his capital, it would be possible for Egypt still to make the necessary arrangements to meet all her engagements, and for the Khedive to carry on his finances in a satisfactory manner. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government have now to consider what course they ought to take with reference to the request made by the Khedive, and they have resolved that they will send out a gentleman of great official experience, who will go out to judge of the position which may be offered him for himself. If he considers that it is one he could usefully occupy, and in which he will be able to do justice to himself and justice to the Egyptian Government, he will resign the important office he now holds in this country, and will accept service under the Khedive, entirely as a servant of the Khedive, and not as in any way connected with the British Government. If, however, that should not prove to be so, he will return and resume the post he now occupies. I should have stated that Mr. Rivers Wilson, the able Controller General of the National Debt Office, is the gentleman who has been selected to fill the office in question. I have now stated what we have thought it right to communicate to the House. It is impossible to say more at present as to the result of this transaction. I have only now to submit to the Committee the Vote which I have placed in the hands of the Chairman. We believe that the purchase is one which has been, and will be, advantageous to all parties concerned. We believe that it will be of advantage to this country, to the Ruler of Egypt, and to the great Company with which we have now associated ourselves. Our feelings towards that great Company and its distinguished founder and leading promoters are those of entire friendliness. We desire to associate ourselves with this important undertaking. I think that England made a great mistake in her incredulity at the outset. I hope it is not too late to retrieve that error, and to associate ourselves with the Company now that it has attained a position of prosperity. We believe that the effect of our taking our proper place in this matter, no longer separating ourselves in our character as customers from our interest as shareholders—but rather, I should say, combining the character of shareholders with that of customers—will be to strengthen, and perpetuate, and ensure the duration of this great work. It is not destined to be a nine years' wonder. It is destined to be an eternal possession of the human race; and it will, I am sure, be a proud satisfaction to us if England fulfils her proper part in securing and consolidating this great enterprise.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,080,000 be granted to Her Majesty, to enable Her Majesty to pay the Purchase Money of the Shares which belonged to the Khedive of Egypt in the Suez Canal, and the Expenses attendant thereon, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON :

I do not rise, Sir, for the purpose of following the Chancellor of the Exchequer through the long and important statement which he has just made. I merely rise to renew an appeal which I made on Friday last to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—but, unfortunately, in the absence of the Prime Minister—that he should not ask the House to proceed at once to discuss in detail the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and take the Vote for which he asks. I think that I shall in very few words be able to show sufficiently good grounds why the request should be complied with. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech by acknowledging the difficulty which he felt in dealing with the mass of information which it would be his duty to lay before the House. Nobody complains that he has laid too much before us; but he has been as good as his word, and he has laid an immense mass of detailed information before us which was not before us previously. The right hon. Gentleman has gone not only through the history of the Suez Canal, but has given us a history of the financial position of Egypt, of the financial difficulties of the Khedive, and other information which, perhaps, was not in the possession of some of us. For the first time the right hon. Gentleman has gone into transactions as to which, I think, it would not be fair to ask the Committee hastily to express an opinion. That he has gone into all these matters with clearness and in great detail I admit; but still we have now for the first time fully stated the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to take the course which they have adopted. We have been informed for the first time of the amount of representation we are to have in the direction of the Canal, and we have had laid before us, in much greater detail than were presented to us before, the reasons which induced Her Majesty's Government to send Mr. Cave upon a special mission to Egypt. I think the Committee will see that much of this is purely in the nature of new matter, and that we ought not to be required to decide upon the question before us immediately after hearing the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. It is perfectly fair when all the information upon the subject is equally before both sides of the House that Her Majesty's Government should call upon us to answer the speeches which have been made by Members of the Government; but a great deal of what has been submitted to-night is entirely new matter, and I appeal to the fairness of Her Majesty's Government not to ask the Committee to come to a hasty and premature decision. If I had not already sufficient grounds for making this appeal, I would find another reason in the short time that the Papers have been laid before us. It is not yet a week since Parliament met, and I acknowledge there has been no delay in the presentation of the Papers. The first batch were Papers of a very interesting character, but not containing a great deal which was not known before. A much larger instalment was presented on Friday, and I shall be very much surprised to hear that there are many Members of the House who have fully mastered that second instalment of Papers. At first sight they appear not to contain information of a very valuable character; but when they are examined more carefully it will be found that they show in the clearest manner the difficulties which had arisen since the Constantinople Commission—difficulties not yet settled, and which will fairly require the action of our Government with a view to remove them. We have not had long to consider those Papers; the Papers which are promised the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) are not yet on the Table; and, under all the circumstances, I can hardly imagine—although, through the courtesy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have received an intimation that it is the wish of Her Majesty's Government to proceed to a vote to-night—that it will be thought reasonable, or for the interest of the public service, that a division upon so great and important a question as this should be taken hastily, and upon information so recently received.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, so far as I can collect the feeling of the Committee it is not one favourable to the suggestion of the noble Lord. The noble Lord complains that a great mass of information is brought before the House for the first time, and it is called upon immediately to decide in reference to that. Now, in the first place, we have no wish to curtail debate. The matter is in the hands of the Committee, who can prolong the discussion until they have satisfied themselves that they are in a position to come to a final decision. Then the noble Lord has spoken vaguely about the information before the House and the great quantity of new details my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has presented to the Committee, and he has protested against being called upon to vote in the matter. But really the great body of details which the Chancellor of the Exchequer necessarily in his first complete statement on the subject has afforded to the Committee to-night were details already well known to the Committee. But when the noble Lord says that it is unfair to call upon the House to give a vote without having before it the details of Mr. Cave's mission, I would remind him that the Vote before us does not involve any approbation or disapprobation of that mission. That was a subject only incidentally and collaterally introduced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the more complete elucidation of the subject of which he was treating; but it was not necessarily a part of his statement, so far as regards the Vote which the Committee are called upon to give. And therefore, when we look to the gist of the complaint of the noble Lord it seems to be this—that we have been favoured to-night with details about Mr. Cave's mission, and therefore we ought not to be called upon to give a vote for the £4,000,000 for the shares of the Khedive. The two subjects, however, have no necessary connection, as I have already pointed out to the Committee, and approbation or disapprobation of Mr. Cave's mission is not involved in the Vote before us. These are the real reasons given by the noble Lord. The other reason is that the Papers moved for by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) have not yet been laid upon the Table of the House; and when they are before us, I doubt whether they will throw any great illustration on the subject. To postpone the Vote because the bye-laws—which do not exist—of the Suez Canal Company are desired by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath seems to me to be a reason of insufficient validity. I trust the noble Lord will not press this matter. Let us go on with the discussion. I do not ask for the Vote to-night. On the contrary, I wish the question to be thoroughly discussed. If the Committee go on to-night and should wish to adjourn the debate until to-morrow, or the day after, or the whole week, I shall not murmur. On the contrary, I should think that course would be very advantageous. But to postpone this Vote, and thus to disturb all the arrangements for Public Business which have been made is a very unusual request. And, believing that I have always shown anxiety to meet the wishes of the House of Commons, I hope and trust the noble Lord will, upon reflection, not press me to assent to a Motion which would be most inconvenient to the public service.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I was hardly prepared for the answer which the right hon. Gentleman has just given to the request of my noble Friend. He says he does not wish to have the Vote to-night if the House should think that an adjourned debate is necessary. But what the right hon. Gentleman does wish is that we should enter upon this most important discussion with insufficient information. ["No."] I am not appealing to the abstract opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite; but I think I can show the truth of what I say. In the first place, I must say that with regard to a subject at once so novel, so important, and so complicated as this, quite irrespective of Parliamentary Papers, the House—aye, and not only that, but the minority of the House—for which the right hon. Gentleman has not so much mercy as he had in former times—is entitled to expect some time for consideration after hearing for the first time an exposition of the policy of the Government. For I maintain it is the first time the policy of the Government has been explained. All that has been said on a former occasion was by way of answer to one or two inquiries upon one or two incidental points. When important financial propositions are made on the Budget, time is always allowed for their consideration. It is quite true that these financial propositions are not known before, and that this has been. But, on the other hand, such financial propositions relate to subject-matters with which we are all conversant, and usually lie within the lines of precedent. But as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has truly said—and as all the admirers and critics of the measure have uniformly said—this is one of the most novel and unusual proceedings that have ever been submitted to Parliament. When, in bringing in the Army and Navy Estimates it happens that the exposition of any particular subject involves novelty of matter, it is the common courtesy of the Government to allow to the House and to the minority time for consideration before asking them to enter into the discussion. But this request of my noble Friend enters upon ground very much more specific. When Her Majesty's Government have called our attention to certain official Papers, and have assented to requests for the production of Papers connected with a particular question, there is an absolute right on the part of the House to request that these Papers should be in the hands of Members before the House enters upon a debate which is to end in a definite vote. Now, how does this matter stand? The Chancellor of the Exchequer has found fault with himself, and has modestly apologized for the length of his speech. Now, I confess I am more inclined to complain of its brevity. A more concise speech generally on a matter of such importance I never heard; but upon one branch of the question—and that the most vital of the whole—he said nothing, except that there was a likelihood that we should have three members sitting on the Direction—with regard to which Direction some inquisitive persons suggested an inquiry as to numbers, and that inquiry was summarily put aside. But the one thing I am anxious to know is this—What is the position into which we are to enter as shareholders? What are the legal rights that we possess as shareholders? and, what are the legal remedies to which we shall be entitled as shareholders? In what Courts and under what circumstances and conditions of law will those rights be asserted and those remedies be granted? These are at once the most important and the most difficult portions of the whole question. And upon these my right hon. Friend has not said one single word. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, taking credit for his own uniform courtesy in meeting the wishes of the House—perhaps it would have been better for him to wait for the compliment from some one else—requires, not that we shall proceed to vote to-night, but only that we shall proceed to speak to-night. But as I wish not to vote without information, so I have a considerable objection to speaking without information. Now in this matter we are shareholders. Do the Government consider that we are in possession at the present moment of all the information which we ought to have with respect to our position as shareholders? No, Sir. Turn to the Papers presented this morning, and you will find that the Government do not possess this information. Lord Derby writes to Colonel Stokes on the 6th of December—

Now, Sir, that is a Report required by Her Majesty’s Government as part of the information necessary to a full understanding of the case. I have said that this information is not in their hands. I do not know whether it is or not; but it is not in our hands, and, clearly, it is right and necessary that such a Report should be in our hands. This is a question with respect to which, if nothing else, the extreme complication of its details will render it necessary to approach it in a dispassionate spirit. There is another reason for keeping this question, if we can, out of the vortex of Party discussion and dealing with it as a matter of business. We are discussing it in the face of the world. Europe has great interest in this matter, as well as ourselves; and any weakness, or passion, or unconscancy we may show in dealing with it will, undoubtedly, be severely criticized. I am sure Her Majesty’s Government will not complain that this proposal was not originally received by the public as a Party question. For my part, I should have found it difficult—so far as the metropolitan Press at least was concerned—to draw a distinction between that portion which was Conservative and that which was Liberal in their—I may almost say—inflammatory approval of the measure. For my part, I must say that I am not willing to discuss the question without the information which Her Majesty’s Government have pointed out to us as being an essential portion of what is requisite. The House may take its own line. It may be that the right hon. Gentleman may have estimated the intentions and views of the majority aright; but I feel it to be my duty to reserve for myself every opportunity of giving a very calm and very careful consideration to the entire subject on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given us so much assistance to-night; and I am very much obliged to him for it. I certainly feel unable to enter into the discussion with any advantage to the House in the condition in which this matter now stands, and our course will be a very simple one. If the Government persevere in their views, we shall have to record our respectful protest against so unusual and inconvenient a manner of proceeding. And I shall reserve the remarks I mean to make until some future stage of the discussion, when I hope the very important Papers moved for by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), and the Report of Colonel Stokes, to which our attention is directed in the Papers, are on the Table of the House. I trust that time will be given for the better consideration of this question. I do seriously point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the course he proposes to take is without precedent. I am not aware in what sense it can serve the public convenience that the House should be required to enter upon this Vote when Papers, indicated by the Government and allowed to be material, have not been laid on the Table of the House.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU entirely concurred in the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. There were special reasons why the debate on this question should be postponed. Without seeing the statutes of the Company and the bye-laws, which the Prime Minister said did not exist, they could not know either their rights or obligations as shareholders. If the right hon. Gentleman doubted the existence of the bye-laws, let him read the despatch written by Lord Derby, in which he urges that they should be at once sent home for the information of the Government. It was clear from the language of the concession and the resolutions of the Company, that shares purchased with a view to acquire moral influence in the administration of the Canal were illegal, and an infringement on the rights of the Sultan, who had the power of withdrawing his consent to the bargain they made with the Khedive whenever he pleased. The discussion ought therefore to be postponed till the resolutions and bye-laws of the Company were produced. The question was not as to the enormous benefit of the Canal to us—that was undoubted—but whether we were right in purchasing these shares by gambling with the people's money, of which we were the trustees. He maintained it was a stock-jobbing transaction, one stock-jobber helping another. It was like the case of an officer in the Army who, in order to support his extravagance, got into the hands of Jews. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had advanced only two arguments—first, if we had not bought the shares which gave us 10 votes at the Board they would have fallen into other hands; but if others had bought them they might have been split into a great many votes, and every owner of 25 shares, so far from attempting to shut the Canal, would have done all they could to keep it open. Their interests would have bound them to assist us in doing that which we could not do with merely 10 votes. The other argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that negotiations were in progress by which he hoped to have three English directors on the Council. That only showed that the right hon. Gentleman had not taken the trouble to read the concession. If he had read it, he would have seen that M. de Lesseps was absolutely despotic. He could do what he liked, and the Board or Council could do very little indeed. There was another reason for postponing this debate. He would quote the opinion of a man who had studied this subject for 33 years and made it his own—a man who had been the political tutor of the Prime Minister in his youth, and who had since been his political Mentor—he meant Mr. David Urquhart. He asked those who were acquainted with the writings of that gentleman whether they had not seen his thoughts and arguments frequently repeated by the Prime Minister. When the words he was about to quote

were written, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lord Derby had spoken on the subject; and what did the political Mentor of the Prime Minister say? He said—

“The purchase of the Suez Canal shares was the act of Mr. Disraeli: we need not, therefore, attach any importance to the trivial words quoted about the transaction by other Members of the Government.”

He (Lord Robert Montagu) thought they need not trouble themselves, therefore, about what the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lord Derby said. Certainly the Firman, the concession, and the statutes of the Company ought to be produced before this discussion was allowed to proceed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER desired to bring back the Committee to what was really the question before them—Whether the Government would or would not accede to the appeal of his noble Friend and his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich to postpone the discussion of this Vote till another evening? The noble Lord who had just sat down began by urging that the debate should be postponed because they were not in a position to discuss the subject; although he certainly went on to discuss it. But, looking at this matter in a business-like point of view—and they they must look at it in a business-like point of view—he did not think they had the information before them which would enable them fully to discuss it. He could understand, though he should very much regret if the Government should say that they could hardly afford to wait till they got the Reports of Mr. Cave and Colonel Stokes; but they would be in a much better position if they had them. At any rate, they had a right to ask that the documents which did exist should be placed in their hands. With regard to the statutes, he had been kindly referred by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to volumes in the Library which contained them. He had found them, and he must say they were of so much importance that they ought to be circulated to every Member of the House. He wanted to know what power we had obtained by the purchase of the shares; how far we had put ourselves into the hands of the present administration of the Canal; whether it was possible to change that administration; and how far we were bound by the resolutions of a general meeting? The Committee had a right to know to what we have given our adhesion. He was perfectly aware that the question was looked at quite otherwise than from a financial point of view; but it certainly was revolting to any man of business to be told that he was to purchase anything subject to conditions of the nature of which he was ignorant.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, with respect to what had just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu), that it might be convenient to make a short explanation as to the bye-laws, because he thought they had been misunderstood. The circumstances were these. There were the Concessions, and accompanying the Concessions were what were called in French the statuts of the Company. That expression was translated in one instance "bye-laws," but there were no bye-laws. [Lord ROBERT MONTAGU said, that was what he meant; statutes or bye-laws.] These were in course of preparation. At present they were in the hands of the Foreign Office printer, and would, no doubt, be soon presented to the House. Then with regard to the resolutions, undoubtedly the shareholders were bound by the resolutions passed at the general meetings of the Company. The Company held its meetings regularly; at each meeting there was a report and certain proceedings; and, naturally, certain resolutions were passed. He had had the whole of the proceedings at the meetings since the commencement looked through, and he was told there were hardly any resolutions that were of the smallest general importance. They were, for the most part, resolutions approving of some statement of accounts, or electing directors, or other matters of no great importance; and, indeed, they could not be, because if they amounted to anything like a change of the statutes they could be of no avail without the consent of the Egyptian Government. However, directions had been given that such resolutions as appeared to have any general interest should be attached to the statutes. The matter would be pushed forward as fast as possible. He wished also to mention this. Some little time ago, one of the Legal Advisers of the Government was employed to make them a careful memorandum and précis of the statuts, and of the various questions connected with them. In that précis he set out shortly all the more important questions; and that Paper would be printed and delivered in the course of a day or two. It was not a very long one, and contained information that would be of great interest. It would give the Concessions, extracts from the principal articles of the statutes, the agreement, and the arbitration of the Emperor of the French.

MR. DILLWYN rose to support the appeal made from the front Opposition Bench. He did so as one who, with the information he now possessed, was altogether in favour of what the Government had done; but the Committee was not in possession of all the information it ought to have.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY observed, that whereas the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them in his speech that we should have little or nothing to spend on the property, we were asked to take up, he found that that view was entirely opposed to the view taken by M. de Lesseps, who knew more about the Canal than anybody else; because as he (Mr. Ashley) understood, the whole course of the disputes during the last year between the Company and the maritime powers had turned upon this—that the state of the Canal was such as would require a large expenditure to make it fit for conveying the commerce of the world. Without having the Report of Colonel Stokes before them, it was impossible for the House to deal with the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. DISRAELI: I only wish to say—and I do so with some trepidation, lest I may again be accused of paying myself a compliment—that I think the predominant feeling of the House, and, indeed, the feeling of the minority, ought to be considered. I never did absolutely oppose the suggestion of the noble Lord. I only said I did not think there was any precedent for it, and I thought there should be good reasons shown in favour of it before I acceded to the suggestion of the noble Lord. Now, the business is one that cannot be delayed beyond a certain point without grave inconvenience to the public service. It has been suggested that the Vote ought to be put off until Thursday; but I myself feel that if it is to be dealt with for the reasons alleged we ought to give to its consideration as much time as possible. The statutes referred to are in the Library; but they are somewhat elaborate, and I will make every exertion to have them placed soon upon the Table. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has offered to give to the Committee what they would find very convenient—a precis, or synopsis, prepared by an eminent authority; and therefore, so far as the statutes are concerned, I should imagine we shall have sufficient information when the discussion comes on. With respect to what has been said about a Report of Colonel Stokes, the subject to which it would relate is at present in negotiation, and when circumstances are in negotiation, critical remarks in popular assemblies do not do much good. Therefore, I would deprecate any discussion on that subject. It would be impossible that we could produce a Report which does not yet exist, and which would embody results which I trust may be accomplished, but which have not yet been. But the other Papers we shall do our best to produce. I shall propose, then, that the debate be adjourned until this day week.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to whom shall be referred all Petitions presented to the House, with the exception of such as relate to Private Bills; and that such Committee do classify and prepare abstracts of the same, in such form and manner as shall appear to them best suited to convey to the House all requisite information respecting their contents, and do report the same from time to time to the House; and that such Reports do in all cases set forth the number of Signatures to each Petition:—And that such Committee have power to direct the printing in extenso of such Petitions, or of such parts of Petitions, as shall appear to require it:—And that such Committee have power to report their opinion and observations thereupon to the House:—Sir CHARLES FORSTER, Mr. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, The O'DONOGHUE, Mr. O'CONOR, Mr. M'LAGAN, Earl De GREY, Mr. KINNAIRD, Lord ARTHUR RUSSELL, Mr. WILLIAM ORMSBY GORE, Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, Mr. REGINALD YORKE, Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, Mr. SANDFORD, Mr. SIMONDS, and Mr. MULHOLLAND:—That three be the quorum.—(Sir Charles Forster.)

COMMISSION ON RAILWAY ACCIDENTS
—THE REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is able to state when the Report of the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents, and the evidence taken before the Commission, are likely to be presented?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, I have heard from Lord Aberdeen, who is Chairman of the Royal Commission since the Duke of Buckingham left for Madras, and who is in Ireland now with some of his Colleagues, that he sees no prospect of their being able to present a Report until after Easter.

FACTORY LEGISLATION (INDIA).

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, in reference to his answer of the 8th of February 1875, Whether anything has yet been done, or is to be done soon, as to Factory Legislation in India?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the matter at present stands thus:—In March last year a Commission was appointed in Bombay to inquire into the subject. The Commission made its Report in July, 1875, the majority being adverse to any legislation upon the subject. The President and Dr. Blaney, another member of the Commission, however, were of opinion that a simple legislative Act would be beneficial both to masters and operatives. The Government upon receiving this Report determined to make further inquiries, and the Collectors of Surat and Broach are now collecting evidence. A final Report may therefore shortly be expected, and upon that the Government of Bombay will base their action.

JUDICATURE ACT, 1873—THE SURREY
ASSIZES.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked Mr. Attorney General, If it is in contemplation to abolish the holding of assizes in the county of Surrey; and, if so, whether he will state to the House the reasons for this determination?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, that an Order in Council stated that it was not contemplated by the Judicature Act that Surrey was to be included in any circuit; but commissions were to be issued into it not less than twice a year for the discharge of civil and criminal business therein, and therefore the Assizes for that county would not be abolished.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—SCURVY

QUESTION.

MR. WARD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether an official inquiry into the circumstances of the breaking out of scurvy on board the "Royal Sovereign" will be, or has been ordered by the Board, when and where it will be held, and whether the report will be published?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, that a searching inquiry had been ordered at Falmouth, where the Royal Sovereign put in. That inquiry would be continued to-morrow in London, and the Report, when presented, would be laid upon the Table of the House, together with other Papers relating to scurvy in the Mercantile Marine, which he regretted to say had lately increased. The owners of the Royal Sovereign had freely placed at the disposal of the Board of Trade all the documents and invoices showing from whom their stores were purchased.

REFEREES.—QUESTION.

MR. WADDY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that Mr. H. W. Verey has been appointed Official Referee under the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1873?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS in reply, said, he had communicated with the Lord Chancellor on the subject, and he was informed that the gentlemen who had been appointed Official Referees under the provisions of the Judicature Act were

Mr. Anderson, Q.C., one of the Examiners of the Court of Chancery; Mr. Dowdeswell, Q.C., of the Oxford Circuit; Mr. Charles Morris Roupell, of Lincoln's Inn, and Mr. H. W. Verey, of the Home Circuit.

MR. WADDY gave Notice that on the earliest day practicable, upon going into Supply, he should call attention to the appointment of Mr. Verey, and should move a Resolution.

POST OFFICE—POSTAL RATES—GENERAL POSTAL UNION—REDUCTION OF RATES.—QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is contemplated to make any and what reduction in the postage of letters to India, the West Indies, and Australia, from one shilling and one shilling and sixpence respectively, seeing that the French Government have reduced their postage for similar distances to all their own colonies to twopence halfpenny?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, it has been settled at the recent Conference at Berne that British India shall enter the Postal Union on the 1st of July next, and, in consequence of that arrangement, the single rate of postage on letters to British India will be reduced on that day from 9d. vid Southampton to 6d., and from 1s. vid Brindisi to 8d. The only alteration contemplated in the case of letters for Australia is to charge those sent vid Brindisi 8d. instead of 9d. No determination has been come to as to reducing the rate to the West Indies. It is not known that the French Government have already reduced their postage on letters to the French Colonies; that postage is now generally 5d. for a single letter. A reduction will, it is believed, take place on the 1st of July next, but only to 4d., not 2½d.

METROPOLIS (PAROCHIAL SYSTEM.)
RESOLUTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER, in rising to move—

said, that the Motion differed in some respects from that which he proposed last year. He now went a step further and said that the subject was one which deserved the attention of Her Majesty's Government. The history of the City of London would probably be well known to most hon. Members. Very soon after the Norman Conquest a Charter was granted which created the Corporation of the City of London; this continued to exist down to the present day. Since that time very few alterations were made in it, which showed the wisdom and foresight of those who prepared it. King James I. had a very just impression that the size of London would become so great that it would at last be unmanageable, and he wished to make some serious alteration, with a view to control its size. In the reign of King Charles II. some effort was made to bring outside wards within the municipal enclosure, and Farringdon and Bishopsgate Street Wards were accordingly included. There were also established Bills of Mortality, means of recording the deaths, and of arriving at other statistical knowledge relating to London. But the limits of the Corporation had remained to this day more or less as they were originally established. It was to London outside the walls that he wished to draw the attention of the House. In 1855 a very considerable alteration was made by Sir Benjamin Hall, subsequently Lord Llanover, who created an outside corporate system, in which there was a single body made up of various local Boards. By Sir Benjamin Hall's Act, in addition to a Council selected by the Vestries, there were local Boards which were elected by the ratepayers. How had the local Boards done their duties under the Act of 1855? The following duties were imposed upon them; they had to superintend the paving and lighting of London and the cleansing of streets; and, what was still more important, they had to inspect vaults and cellars; to prevent overcrowding of dwellings; and to appoint inspectors of nuisances and medical officers of health. Those duties, he believed, it would be acknowledged were most imperfectly performed. As regarded paving, hon. Members of the House had ocular evidence of that. If any further evidence were needed, he might quote that given before a Committee of that House in 1866 by Mr. Beal, a prominent vestryman, who said—

Perhaps the Vestries were not altogether to blame for the lighting, which was a fault resulting rather from the system, under which powerful companies had to be opposed by weak Vestries, so that it was not surprising that the public suffered. As to cleansing, we occasionally saw a watercart, but our roads were allowed to be in a dirty condition, and the dust was sometimes intolerable. It was the duty of Vestries to remove dust and refuse from houses. He was informed that that was extremely imperfectly done; that unless servants gave something in the shape of a bribe to dustmen, dust was not removed at all, and that it was a perpetual source of annoyance to householders. With regard to houses in Southwark, in the parish of St. George, Dr. Rendle, in his letter printed in the Appendix to the Report of Mr. Aytoun's Committee, said—“Most of the houses are, from various causes, too unclean to be safe.” They could not be otherwise; water for purposes of cleanliness was almost everywhere deficient. In two houses the people said—“We are in a dreadful state; our rent has been raised from 7s. to 8s. a-week, but we can get nothing done.” One woman appeared quite terrified, and assured her landlord, who was there, that she “had not informed.” It is useless to expect the poor, lodgings being scarce, to speak out. “The foul smells are scarcely endurable,” said one. Another said—“They do the outside, but not the inside.” Of the 96 houses visited 30 stood as follows:—The water-closets were entirely without water, and there was not the least attempt at a supply, although the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 81, ordered “sufficient water supply to closets.” There were water closets with water supply through a straight pipe without valve or tap, and privy gases were admitted easily and directly into the drinking butt. In three places, the closets not being fit for use, the open yards were used instead. In four places the one closet for five houses was open to the observation of boys in the next street, and the soil was heaped up and running out at the door. Of the 96 houses visited 42 required the inspector; some were without any water supply, some without water receptacles, and some had rotten or broken receptacles; “they let the water out as fast as it runs in.” All the houses, with two or three exceptions, were without covers to butts, and so, as one woman said, “every bit of dust and dirt comes in.” These, if cleansed, would become filthy immediately, from the atmosphere in these close, filthy places, from drains and dung-heaps close at hand, from refuse, rags, and dead animals wantonly thrown by children into the open butt. In two cases the small open casks were standing in pools of liquid night-soil. In a very large number the supply was quite insufficient—15 houses with 181 inhabitants had water receptacles holding 456 gallons, 2½ gallons to each person. The 25 & 26 Vict., c. 102, s. 77, ordered a supply not exceeding 30 gallons per individual. From this evidence it appeared that the Vestry did not order, or the orders were not carried out. This state of things he (Sir William Fraser) ventured to say was attributable in no small degree to the system of government which now prevailed in the metropolis. It was the opinion certainly of some of the vestrymen that in the Vestries there were persons one would not wish to see there if London was to be well governed. Meetings and elections of Vestries were, according to Mr. Beal, not unfrequently held in public-houses, and only a small number of vestrymen attended. For instance, in the parish of St. James, where there were 30,000 ratepayers, he understood, that only 25 ratepayers attended to elect the 60 vestrymen. The election of the vestrymen was conducted by a few individuals, and appeared to be a mere nominal proceeding. He thought it was well worth the attention of the Imperial Government to remove this state of things from London, which as had been said, contained more inhabitants than Portugal, Holland, and Scotland. Various schemes at different times had been proposed for the improvement of this state of things. One was to extend the power of the Lord Mayor and Corporation, and make one vast corporation of the whole of the metropolis, including about 4,000,000 souls. Another was to take the Parliamentary boroughs and make them into municipal boroughs, with mayors and common councils of their own. It was also proposed by other reformers to give the Secretary of State for the Home Department larger powers, and to place the population of London under his control. There were other schemes, but these, he thought, were the principal ones. Although the task might be difficult, he could not help believing that some scheme might be devised, not to create a Utopia, but to improve materially the condition of the inhabitants of the metropolis. He did not ask that we should attempt to make of London

At that moment Her Majesty's Government had a very loyal majority, and the present seemed a fitting opportunity for dealing with this question. We found that greater cities had existed than the metropolis in past days. We resembled the Romans, who retained possession of the world for many centuries, not so much by their soldiers as by their admirable method of government. Like the Romans, we had but little public taste; but with regard to the power of organization, he believed no people ever existed in the world who were capable of so much organization as the British. The give-and-take—the power of forbearance must have immense influence in all municipal institutions, and the population of London were most patient and enduring. Perhaps it might be asked, if he thought things were so bad, why he did not bring in a Bill to remedy them? But for any unofficial Member of the House to carry a Bill on that subject was quite impossible. It would require the whole power of a strong Government to accomplish it. He would, however, offer two very humble suggestions, the adoption of which might somewhat lessen the existing evils. The first was to diminish the number of the parochial districts; and the second to have the central body elected, not by the vestries, but by the general body of the ratepayers. He appealed to the Government to take the matter up, and endeavour to remedy the grievances of the people of this great metropolis, who, as he had said, were more numerous than the population of Scotland, and who surely deserved that some attention should be paid to their wants. In that way the present generation might leave the local administration of London in a considerably better state than they had found it. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. LOCKE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the parochial system is unsuitable and inadequate to the reasonable requirements of the inhabitants of the Metropolis; and that the subject deserves the attention of Her Majesty's Government, with a view to remove by legislation the great evils which at present exist."—
(Sir William Fraser.)

MR. GOLDNEY said, he was induced to join in that discussion only because he had for several years past taken an active part in reference to two of the points mentioned by the hon. Baronet—namely, the supply of gas and water. He had listened to the hon. Baronet, and thought his complaints were very small and trivial in comparison with the magnitude of his Motion, and the only suggestion the hon. Baronet seemed to have to make was, that they should diminish the number of the parochial authorities. There were at present 23 parishes carrying on local administration with an average population of 100,000 each. There were and must be complaints at all times of local government, and both last year and this year the head of the Local Government Board had given notice of intended measures for its improvement. But he maintained that there were no bodies who were making greater progress than the constituted authorities now existing, and there were no Petitions from the inhabitants of the Metropolis complaining that the vestrymen were improperly elected or failed in their duty. Water had been supplied with great care to every district. He did not think that any great abuse existed if nothing more could be said than that some old lady had been called on to pay sixpence on account of her water-butt on entering upon her property. Was that a sufficient reason for coming forward to ask for a sweeping change in the government of the metropolis, a subject which had puzzled some of their greatest legislators during the last 20 years. He was satisfied that every measure that was brought forward for the improvement of the condition and comfort of the inhabitants of the metropolis would receive proper consideration from the Metropolitan Board, who had performed their duties in a very efficient manner, for the benefit of the metropolis generally, especially as regarded the supply and purity of gas. Unless more distinct complaints could be brought forward he did not think the hon. Baronet could hope for success in the prosecution of his Motion.

MR. LOCKE said, he was astonished at the charming description given by the last speaker of the admirable way in which those who supplied the public with gas and water did their duty. If everything was really so satisfactory as the hon. Gentleman said, the consumers must be very ungrateful, for they found considerable fault with those articles from time to time. He did not, however, quite understand what the hon. Baronet (Sir William Fraser) wished, for he had not pointed out any mode of setting things right if they were wrong. He was not aware that the persons whom the hon. Baronet wished to seek were not there already. There were a great many persons appointed to look after them, and to set them in a proper condition, but he did not see that his hon. Friend had shown any mode of setting things right if they were really wrong. He had looked into these matters some years back, and had considered whether by a different division of the metropolis its condition might not be improved, but the plan he had approved had not been taken up. For himself, he did not say that the Metropolitan Board of Works had not performed their duty to a certain extent, but he thought that the metropolis would be better governed if the City were extended, so as that one body should embrace the whole of London, and perform its duties without any clashing between one authority and another. The hon. Baronet had said that everything was very wicked, very shocking, and very uncomfortable, but he had not made any suggestion for remedying the evil. He left all that to the Government. It was sincerely to be hoped that whatever the Government might say or do in the matter would redound to the advantage of the community.

SIR ANDREW LUSK, speaking as the Representative of a metropolitan constituency, maintained that the work of cleansing, lighting, &c., in the metropolis was very well done indeed, considering the difficulties the Vestries and district Boards had to contend with. If any one went to his borough, he hoped not as an intending candidate for Parliamentary honours, they would find it as well paved and lighted and cleaned as the City of London. In that respect London was certainly better off than Glasgow, Manchester, or Liverpool. It was all very well for the hon. Baronet to find fault with vestrymen; but they gave much valuable time from day to day in discharging the duties of their office, and they were men, many of them of good ability, and discharged these duties in a way creditable to themselves and useful to the public. The hon. Baronet spoke slightly of vestries because some old woman had had her water-butt empty, and some other old woman was grumbling about her dust-hole; but what scheme had the hon. Baronet to propose for the better government of the metropolis? None. The government of London was a work of immense difficulty, and for his part he would say it was—

It was easy to grumble about the way in which vestrymen and others did their work, but he should like to see any Lord or Baronet who complained of this maladministration on the part of vestries and district boards, looking after the sweeping of the streets, the dust carts, and nuisances themselves. Instead of attempting to upset the existing state of things, for which it would not be easy to devise a better, he hoped the hon. Baronet would withdraw his Motion, and leave the matter to the Government, who would no doubt do what was proper.

SIR JAMES HOGG said, he felt bound to say a few words on the subject, though he did not propose to follow the hon. Baronet into the history of the Corporation of London, which had nothing to do with the present question. The hon. Baronet contended that the parochial system was unsuitable and inadequate to the requirements of the metropolis. He (Sir James Hogg) must confess he had some difficulty in understanding what was meant by the parochial system of London, and he could not conceive how anyone who took the trouble to prepare speeches for that House could fall into such a mistake as to speak of the local management of the metropolis by that name. He was bound to take exception to much of what the hon. Baronet had stated in support of his Motion in saying that the parochial and district Boards had not fulfilled their charge in respect of paving, lighting, and cleansing. As regarded the paving, in attempting to make out a case against the authorities, he did not even bring up his statistics, but had contented himself with quoting from a Report dated as far back as 1866, and relying upon the evidence of Mr. Beal, who had made himself notorious in connection with the subject. As for the charge that some of the back streets of London were not kept in such admirable order as could be desired, it was no doubt true, and he (Sir James Hogg) hoped the Vestries concerned would do their best to improve matters. As to lighting, the hon. Baronet had some complaint to make, but said he did not blame the Vestries or district Boards. Why, then, did he bring up the question at all? The quality of the gas was not under the control of those bodies, and all they could do was to endeavour to get it as good as possible. The Metropolitan Board, for their part, had done and would do their best, in conjunction with the City of London, to improve the gas supply, and to have it placed under better regulations. Last Session he ventured to bring in three Bills, backed by the Corporation of the City and the Metropolitan Board, to deal with the subject, but, unfortunately, he did not meet with as much support as he should have liked. Two of the Bills had, therefore, to be given up, but one—the Regulation Bill—was read a second time and went before a Committee. The alterations then made upon it had been accepted by the Corporation and the Metropolitan Board, and were embodied in a Bill which he should bring before the House on the earliest possible day for the second reading. It was futile to say there was no central authority, because the Metropolitan Board was really a central authority to all intents and purposes; and although he did not wish to speak in any laudatory spirit of the work of that body, yet as a simple matter of justice he wished to show that they were striving to do their duty to the metropolis at large. The question of dust was no doubt of some importance. He had himself received many complaints about it, and he thought more attention ought to be paid to it by the various Vestries and district Boards. Whenever he received complaints of that kind, he invariably sent them to the authorities concerned, and at the same time brought them under the particular notice of the representatives of those bodies sitting at his Board. Those complaints, he believed, had received every attention, and he hoped the evil would gradually diminish. He remembered, when he held the position of a vestryman, the medical officer had reported that there were cellars and places inhabited by poor people, and in which human beings ought not to live; but if those poor people were turned out, the question was, where were they to go? Under the admirable Artizans' Dwellings Act he hoped this evil, too, would be greatly mitigated, if not entirely removed, by the combined action of the various bodies concerned. The water supply of London had been complained of. Well, it was at least a question whether it was not superior to that of many large cities and towns in England, and reports which had been made on the subject showed that, at all events, it was not the detestable compound it was said to be. The hon. Baronet said he had been informed that Vestry elections were often held in public-houses. Though he (Sir James Hogg) had himself been several times elected as a member of local Vestries, he had never heard of any such elections taking place, except at a large public building hired for the purpose. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet that a large number of people did not attend to these matters, but that was the fault of gentlemen of intelligence and standing, who, instead of going on the local and district Boards, and giving attention to local affairs, contented themselves with finding fault with those who had to discharge that duty. The hon. Baronet proposed to diminish the parochial areas, and that the members of district Boards be elected by householders directly and not by the ratepayers only. He also suggested that members of the Central Board, meaning the Metropolitan Board, should be elected directly instead of being chosen by the Vestries and local Boards they represented. With respect to the first point there were Returns showing that the local areas were at present sufficient to ensure fair elections, while as to direct representation on the Metropolitan Board, the members who were sent there by the various local Vestries and district Boards brought with them a large amount of practical knowledge and varied experience, and did honour to the districts which sent them; and he could personally testify to the admirable manner in which they discharged their duties. Of course, it was for Her Majesty's Government to say whether a certain portion should be brought in by direct representation. The hon. Baronet said the City of London did not wish to join the Metropolitan Board on account of the debt, but he was not aware that the City had no debt. The debt of the Metropolitan Board was consolidated, and with regard to that consolidation, it was clear that it was a great public advantage in every way to have one stock at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, instead of having one part at 4, another at  $4\frac{1}{2}$ , and another at 5 per cent, and all running for different periods. Since the Report to which the hon. Baronet alluded was made many of the evils referred to had been ameliorated, others were being ameliorated, and he could assure him that whenever any evils or defects were pointed out they would be attended to, and would receive full consideration, not only from the Vestries and district Boards, but from the Metropolitan Board, who would endeavour to exercise their powers for their removal or amelioration.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the hon. Baronet who had brought this matter forward had it greatly at heart, because many years ago he had it under his consideration, and had brought it before Parliament more than once. The hon. Baronet called everything he could to his aid; for, unlike the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), who brought the subject forward in the sunshine of June or July, he took advantage of the wet and snow of February. He hoped, however, he would be excused if he did not enter into any lengthened statement on the question at present. He did not gather that it was the wish of the House that they should just now discuss what would be the best form of government for the whole of the metropolis. The Motion referred to the parochial system; but the original parochial system had, to a considerable extent at all events, been changed by the legislation which led to the formation of district Boards. No one could say the present system was perfect; no one could say it might not be amended, but it was more difficult to say the best form of government to adopt. They would have in the course of the present Session several very practical points brought before them bearing on this question. If he understood rightly, they would have the great question of the water supply to the metropolis brought directly before the notice of the House, and they already had notice that they would have to discuss the whole question of the gas supply; and, further, the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire would again bring forward his Bill and invite discussion upon it. When those schemes were put forward in a practical shape, he should be prepared, on behalf of the Government, to discuss them, to raise objections to them, or to say what he could in their favour, as the case might be. With all these particular schemes before them, he thought it would be better to postpone any lengthened discussion until other opportunities occurred. The hon. Baronet might be quite sure that the attention of the Government must necessarily be directed to the subject by those various measures, and he hoped, therefore, that the Motion would not be pressed to a division. It would, no doubt, be embarrassing that there should be a Resolution that this question deserved the immediate attention of the Government, and he hoped the Government would be allowed to wait until the schemes to which he referred were brought forward.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, although the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was satisfactory as far as it went, yet it would have been much more satisfactory to have heard something approaching a promise not only that the attention of the Government would be directed to this subject, but that the House might hope to have something approaching to a measure dealing with the grievance. As to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Truro (Sir James Hogg), he did not think there was much to argue. He regretted to hear expressions used which they were not accustomed to, such as "futile," applied to the remarks of a Member. Although, no doubt, there was an assembly in Spring Gardens where language of that description was sometimes heard, he trusted it would not be imported into that House.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD, in rising to move that leave be given to bring in a Bill to explain the Law relating to Cheques or Drafts on Bankers, said, that before 1854 cheques were distinguishable from bills of exchange in several important particulars. They were payable exclusively to bearer on presentation in cash; they were unstamped, and were assignable by delivery. In 1854, however, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), in one of his Stamp Acts, assimilated with cheques to bearer cheques to order, which were to be unstamped. In 1856 legislation took place to enable the crossing upon a cheque to become an essential and integral part of the cheque itself, so that the crossed cheque became payable only through a banker. In 1858 a further change took place with regard to the stamp duties, the cheques upon bankers, whether payable to bearer or to order, were to be stamped with a penny stamp. Another clause was introduced into the Act of 1858. A banker was responsible for the genuineness of any endorsement upon a bill of exchange which was addressed to his house, and which he paid; but a banker, from the very necessity of the case, when the new instrument of which he was speaking was introduced, was exonerated from any liability as regarded the responsibility for endorsement, so that, so far as that responsibility and the stamp duty were concerned, cheques became very different documents from bills of exchange. Under the then provisions of the law those cheques to order became one of the safest and most convenient mediums of making payments, either for trade or personal purposes, and to a large extent did away with the necessity of using Bank-notes. The money for them could be received by nobody but the person for whom it was intended, for if one of those cheques fell into the hands of a thief, he could do nothing with it, being crossed to a banker, unless, indeed, which was very improbable, he happened to have a banker of his own, or a confederate who was in that position. In the event, therefore, of the cheque being presented for payment the banker would have the means of tracing the thief and bringing him to justice. Under the operation of a form of payment so convenient, not only trading operations, but personal payments or tradesmen's bills were easily dealt with, and on the cheque, when once paid and returned with the endorsement of the payee, there was a full discharge of his claim. Within the last 12 months, however, the security and convenience of that form of payment had been very rudely assailed. Mills and Co. drew a cheque for £21 on the Union Bank of London, payable to the order of Smith, who, having endorsed the cheque and crossed it with the name of his own bankers—the London and County Bank—gave it to his clerk to pay into his account. The clerk was waylaid by a thief, who stole the cheque, and passed it to a man named Thurger for £8 10s., who in his turn passed it on to a person with the initial "C." a customer of the London and Westminster Bank, who paid the cheque in there, and the bank, not looking particularly to the nature of the crossing, presented it to the Clearing House, and there, equally without examining the crossing, the Union Bank by pure inadvertence paid it. Smith, when he discovered his loss, applied to the Union Bank, which he held to be responsible to him. The Union Bank, however, not unnaturally disliked to pay twice over, and said they would fight the question of responsibility. They accordingly fought it, and, unhappily for the trading community, they succeeded in the suit, which was tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, when Mr. Justice Blackburn decided that Smith, the plaintiff in the case, had no valid claim, because "C." the holder of the cheque, was a bona fide holder, and was, therefore, entitled to the money which he received. Against that decision there was an appeal to the Superior Court, when the judgment of the Court below was affirmed; the argument of Mr. Justice Blackburn as to the inexpediency of not restraining the negotiability of the document being there repeated, while the Judges evidently felt that there was something wrong, because they did not deny that nothing could be more distinct than the provisions of the Act of 1858, which set forth that any banker paying a cheque crossed with the name of a banker to any other banker than the person named in the crossing should be held to have done wrong. But as no penalty was attached to that provision, it was maintained that if it was intended to be anything more than a caution, it ought to be carried further by means of legislation. Now, that was what he proposed to do. The Judges in both Courts, he might add, contended that "C." must be held to be the bond fide holder, and had assumed that it was so admitted on the part of the plaintiff; but he was in possession of a statement of the attorney for the plaintiff, in which, in the most distinct terms, he repudiated the idea that his client or himself had for a moment admitted the bond fide ownership of "C." They, on the contrary, maintained that the cheque, being crossed with the name of a specific banker, constituted a warning to him which precluded him from becoming the bond fide holder. As to the question of negotiability which had been raised, he believed that it was in the case to which he referred a perfect figment. Negotiability involved the existence of a bargain, and in the case of bills of exchange there was a bargain, and the price to be given for them, therefore, became matter of negotiation. A cheque, however, was subject to no bargaining, and it was payable immediately. The only price which could be given for it was the amount which it bore upon its face. Nor were these cheques negotiable in the same way as bank notes. Bank notes passed from hand to hand without responsibility for their nominal value. Cheques were the creation of the individual for his own convenience; whereas bank notes were the creation of the sovereign power. They were paper money, and the banks which had the delegated power of issuing them paid a considerable revenue on account of that privilege into the Exchequer. If cheques were to be placed on the same footing, it would enable the individual of his own motion to do that which the banks could only do by the delegation of the State, and thus the Exchequer would be deprived of a considerable amount of revenue. To make a crossed cheque transferable like a bank note would be impolitic and destructive to the purposes for which it was created by the drawer. It was not created to pass from hand to hand, but to make a payment from his own banker to another individual. The House would, therefore, see that the negotiability stipulated for as an attribute of crossed cheques was most unreal, and, if it could be realized, would be most destructive and impolitic. Further, the drawer wanted to make a payment through his own banker to a certain individual and to get a receipt; and if it was delayed there were two risks, as the banker might fail, in which event the drawer might have to pay the money over again. The simple remedy he had to propose was—first, that a banker having paid a cheque wrongfully, in violation of the statute, should not thereby be discharged from the liability intended to be imposed upon him by the directions of the cheque; and, secondly, that he who should steal, or whose confederate should steal, a crossed cheque should not by that theft acquire a title in a document which was distinctly, from its nature and contents, not intended to pass from hand to hand. His Bill was confined to these two points, and he hoped it would receive the sanction of the House. In conclusion, the right hon. Member moved for leave to introduce the Bill.

Mr. GREGORY, in seconding the Motion, expressed, as a man of business experience, his thanks to the right hon. Member for the City of London for having proposed it, as it dealt effectively with a subject of great importance to the commercial classes in this country. He regretted his right hon. Friend had not been one of the counsel in the case; for if he had been retained the result might have been different. Although, no doubt, an appeal might be preferred against the judgment of the Court, having regard to the constitution and strength of that Court, he did not think there would be much chance of such an appeal being successful. There was one point in his judgment, however, on which he might be allowed an observation. The Judges seemed to have assumed that the presenter of the cheque was a bond fide holder of it; but by the Act 21 & 22 Vict. it was distinctly laid down that the crossing of a cheque was an integral part of the cheque itself; and, therefore, how any person could be a bond fide holder who taking a cheque so crossed paid it to one when it was crossed to another banker he was at a loss to conceive. But for present purposes we must accept the judgment of the Court, and deal with it as we found it. He was glad to think that further legislation on the subject had been suggested by the Lord Chancellor himself. In his opinion, the Bill now introduced by his right hon. Friend was so moderate in itself, and so well calculated to remove the grievance occasioned by the judgment, that he trusted it would receive the sanction both of the House and of Her Majesty's Government.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not desire in the least to oppose the introduction of the Bill, which might prove to be a very excellent and beneficial measure. On this point, however, he did not at present wish to pronounce any opinion. He believed that the Bill, if it were to be operative in the direction in which it was intended to be operative, must be a Bill to restrain the negotiability of crossed cheques. That might be a very wise and politic measure to introduce, and he would say nothing further on that point; but, as the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal seemed to have been arraigned, perhaps the House would pardon him if he made a remark or two about that. The facts of the case, which had been already detailed, were very short and simple. Mills and Co. had drawn a cheque in favour of Smith, payable to Smith's order. After Smith indorsed it, it was stolen from his clerk, and it went through a few hands, or a number of hands, until it came, as was admitted, for value, into the hands of "C." According to the view which the Courts took of the matter, that cheque could not be paid to anybody but "C." It could not be paid to Smith, and if the Union Bank of London committed an error in paying it—as they undoubtedly did—still they had not done any injury to Smith, the plaintiff in the case; because under no possible circumstances could he have recovered the amount for which the cheque was drawn. Therefore, the whole judgment of the Queen's Bench and of the Court of Appeal—over which the Lord Chancellor presided—was founded on this—that the Act of 1858 did not by its provisions restrain the negotiability of cheques—that cheques crossed in this way were negotiable, and that this particular cheque having been negotiated, Smith, who was the plaintiff, could not be damaged by its having been paid in the way it was. And now he would say a few words concerning the negotiability of a cheque. The law at present was—it might be desirable to alter it, but the law at present was—that a cheque made payable to bearer was negotiable—that was to say, it might pass from hand to hand. It was a mandate to the banker with whom the drawer had assets to pay the money to anybody who presented the cheque. So with regard to a cheque payable to order; it was a mandate to the banker to pay the money to any person who might be authorized to receive it. The meaning of negotiability was that the document passed under such circumstances from hand to hand. This was the law, and the view the Courts took was that there was nothing in the Act of Parliament which interfered with or altered the law in this respect. In his humble opinion, that view was perfectly sound and right. Reference had been made to some admissions supposed to have been made by the plaintiff's attorney or counsel with respect to the fact that "C." was a bond fide holder for value. Whether he was or not was a question of fact, with regard to which he knew nothing; but he did know that the question could not have been brought before the Court to be disposed of as a legal question unless it had been admitted or taken for granted that "C." was a bond fide holder for value; because if the question had been left at large whether "C." was a bond fide holder for value, that was a matter which would have been disposed of by a jury, and not by the Judges. Having made these remarks, he did not wish to offer the least opposition to the Bill.

MR. FORSYTH agreed in the expediency of the Bill being brought in, though he thought that the judgment of the Court of Law ought not to be challenged. In the case referred to the proper appeal was not to the House of Commons, but to the House of Lords sitting as a judicial tribunal. It would be unfortunate if this House were to proceed on the ground that the judgment of the Court was wrong. It was better to assume that the judgment was right, and to say it was desirable to alter the law. He thought the judgment was right for technical reasons, with which he would not trouble the House; but he would endeavour to show that it was desirable to alter the law, and that this Bill would do it effectually. The law laid down was that although if a person who had a cheque given to him crossed it to a particular bank, yet if it got into the hands of a bond fide holder, the crossing of it, even if it had been stolen from the payee, would be no protection, and it might be presented through any banker for payment. That seemed to him dangerous, because the object of crossing was to prevent its being paid by any banker except the banker whose name was crossed upon it. Such a payment was, however, held to be good in the case which had been referred to. He did not agree with his right hon. Friend that cheques were not negotiable. They were. They passed from hand to hand constantly; but if they went through a dozen hands it ought to be provided that they should ultimately be paid only through the banker whose name was written across them. It was an unfortunate feature of the case under consideration that the cheque was stolen, and yet that the thief was enabled to give a bond fide title to another holder, so that by that means the latter was enabled to procure payment of the amount for which the cheque had been drawn. If the Bill which his right hon. Friend asked leave to introduce passed, the thief would not be allowed to take advantage of his theft, nor would a person who had stolen a cheque be able to give a better title to another person in respect of it than he himself possessed. By that means the inviolability of the cheque would be maintained and a panic such as the judgment in question had occasioned among the commercial community would not again occur.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER regretted that occasionally Judges started new and ingenious points which gave rise to great inconvenience. People went on with their business believing that they were acting in strict accordance with the law, when suddenly a question arose, ingenious counsel started a novel point, it was adopted by the Judge, and long-established usage and practice was at once upset. For his part, he held that a person who took a crossed cheque was party to a contract. If it was crossed to a particular banker, he agreed that he would receive payment through that particular banker, and not in any other way—the drawer having secured himself against loss by the crossing of the cheque. That appeared to be a sensible and intelligible view of the case, and when he was told that the holder of the cheque in the case alluded to was a bond fide holder, he demurred to the assertion. Even though he had given full value for the cheque, he was not, in his opinion, a bond fide holder—for this reason, that he was a purchaser with notice. He saw on the face of the cheque that it was crossed to a particular banker. That was notice to him and ought to have excited his suspicion. It was not generally negotiable. If it had been, it would be payable to bearer, and if he took the risk of accepting the cheque after notice, he had no reason to complain if he lost his money. His right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London had, he thought, done good service to the commercial community by introducing a measure which would have the effect of placing the law on the subject beyond the reach of doubt.

MUNICIPAL OFFICERS SUPERANNUATION BILL.—[BILL 2.]

(Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Birley, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Cawley, Mr. Kirkman Hodgson, Mr. Torr.)

MR. RATHBONE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he should like to quote an argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, founded on the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners who had been appointed to consider the subject. They reported that it was important that the mind of the Civil servant should be set at ease as to his position in case his health broke down, or that he was otherwise incapacitated; next, that when a Civil servant had spent the best part of life in the public service and was suddenly incapacitated, they thought public opinion would not allow him to starve; and thirdly—and this last was the main ground on which he based the measure—that many persons were kept in the service after they had become unfit to fulfil their duties, simply because their removal would be a hardship. Actual experience of the latter ground had shown him the necessity for some such measure as he submitted to the consideration of the House, and which he might say he did at the request of the Corporation of Liverpool. They had been told that in one Corporation the retention of officials who had been meritorious public servants and who had lost their health by their devotion to the service and were no longer able efficiently to perform their duties had cost the town no less than £70,000. He would mention one case with the circumstances of which he was personally acquainted. It was that of the medical officer of a large town who had conferred great benefits not only on the community among whom he had laboured, but on the public at large. This gentleman was just able now to carry on his work. If, however, an epidemic should break out, and if he were to break down, and was unable to discharge his duties, would not the loss to the town be ten times greater than if they provided him with a decent retiring pension? Yet it would be unfair to turn him out without some provision for his old age. The present Bill, which was supported by nearly all the Corporations in the Kingdom, provided that before a pension was granted to a public officer the approval of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State should be obtained; that the superannuation should not exceed the rate of pensions granted under the best tables to public servants; that the grant of a pension should be voluntary on the part of the Corporation or the public body; that no grant should be valid unless sanctioned by two meetings of the Council, the second of which was held at the interval of a month from the first, two-thirds of the members of the Council being present; and that the Council or public body might, if they thought fit, make arrangements to deduct certain portions of the officers' salaries or emoluments to form a fund out of which such superannuation might be paid. As the Bill also provided all necessary checks he hoped the House would consent to the second reading of the measure.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

MR. FIELDEN said, that as he opposed the same Bill in the year 1873, he must oppose the Bill now before the House. He opposed it on the broad principle that the tendency of legislation of this kind was to treat people as children and not as grown-up men; whereas what the House ought to encourage, especially in persons in the receipt of large incomes, was a feeling of independence, self-reliance, and thrift. Now, the system of pensions and superannuations struck at all these principles. He opposed this measure also on account of the experience already obtained as to the effect of granting pensions and superannuations in the public service. If the same principles were introduced into municipal corporations, the increase of local rates would become so enormous that they would be perfectly unbearable. What had been the increase of pensions and superannuations in the public Departments during the last 30 years? In 1844 the amount of superannuations and pensions was £627,400; in 1854 it had increased to £706,400; in 1864 it was £850,300; while in 1874, according to the last Return issued, it had increased to the enormous amount of £1,080,700, an increase of £453,300 in 30 years, or at the rate of 72 per cent. Looking at its working in the public service, it was probable that if the principle were introduced into municipal corporations it would cause a great increase of rates. The fact was that the House as holding the purse-strings of the nation would be compelled to meet this matter face to face. He wanted to know, if this Bill should pass, where the principle was to stop? The hon. Member had quoted individual instances of hardship; but if we legislated on individual instances we should make bad laws, and do what the House would, individual grievances would occur. If the principle of superannuation were extended to municipal corporations, did the House suppose it would end there? If mu-municipal corporations were excluded, all other bodies would be prevented from claiming the same privileges; but once open the door by this Bill, and why should not Boards of Guardians and Local Boards be permitted to grant superannuations? [An hon. MEMBER: Local Boards do.] He was not aware of this. They could compensate for removal from office; but Local Boards had no power to grant superannuation allowances. Other Boards, such as school boards, had been established which made heavy demands on the rates. They were told that in the metropolis alone the enormous sum of £25,000 last year had been spent in getting children out of the streets and making them go to school. If the House would remember the number of persons now employed under school boards, they would be able to estimate the drain upon the school boards if all these officials were able to claim superannuation allowances. The local rates were growing enormously, and he would ask hon. Members whether they were prepared to vote for a measure which, if carried to a logical conclusion, would add largely to the rates? In the appendix to the fourth annual Report on the Local Government Board for 1874-5 would be found a statement of the sum levied as poor rates in England—only a portion of which went to the poor, while a large proportion went to other purposes. In 1840 the amount levied under the head of poor rates in England was £6,067,400; in 1844, £6,990,100; in 1854, £7,317,900; in 1864, £9,680,400; in 1874, £12,851,000. Within the period embraced by the Returns the increase had been £6,783,000, or at the rate of 112 per cent, and he did not think it would stop there. Then, if it was proposed to give superannuation in respect to men receiving from £300 to £600 a-year, why not also superannuate the labouring man when he was broken down in health or overtaken by accident? for he did as much in his way to produce the wealth of the country as any official of a corporation. He opposed the Bill on the ground that they ought to teach the people habits of independence, self-reliance, and thrift; and, because he believed it to be opposed to that principle, he moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Fielden.)

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that the large increase in pensions was due to a corresponding increase in the number of Civil servants and the total amount of wages; and he considered pensions to be deferred wages. The granting of pensions secured efficient services at a price lower than that at which they would be obtained if there were power to turn a man away at any time without any provision for his future maintenance; and it had been generally considered that the allowance of pensions was an advantageous method of paying for public services. The Bill did not affect the position of persons who were in the service of the Government; but the same principle was of course in existence there and elsewhere. In the Bank of England they considered that pensions were only a part of salary. They were only deferred salary; and it was considered that the service of the Bank was more efficiently and economically performed because pensions were given. This, therefore, was by no means so one-sided a question as it had been represented to be. Although manual labourers were not pensioned, they were not usually turned away after many years of faithful service; and he would appeal to the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) to say whether the men in his establishment were turned away penniless in their old age. He would also appeal to the Members of the Government to say whether the granting of pensions did not work advantageously in the public service. They were given by almost every bank and by many private establishments; and all that the Bill proposed was that the municipal service of the country should not be an exception to a salutary rule. He agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Fielden) that every encouragement should be given to working men to lay money by. Was that not done already? Had they not their clubs to provide against calamities which might occur to them in life? He thought this Bill a wise and prudent one, and should therefore vote for the second reading.

MR. ANDERSON said, he thought the argument of the hon. Member who had last spoken was a strong one against the Bill. He also said pensions were a part of salaries, and the consequence of the passing of this Bill would be that a great number of municipal servants whose services had been fixed without any view to a pension, and consequently on a liberal scale, would put pressure upon their different municipalities to give them pensions in addition. This showed that the argument of the hon. Member cut two ways. Undoubtedly, if they gave municipalities this power of superannuation, they would open up a field for unlimited jobbery, for municipalities would be subjected to constant pressure for superannuation allowances. He would have been surprised at the hon. Member for Liverpool bringing forward this Bill, but for the fact that he brought forward the same Bill three years ago, when there was, though not a majority, a large minority against it and it failed to pass. If it were, as alleged, that the Corporation of Liverpool was anxious to superannuate one of its officers, let the Corporation bring in a Private Bill for the purpose, and not saddle the whole of the country with a jobbery Bill for superannuating all municipal officers merely to please Liverpool.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought he should explain to the House the vote he meant to give upon this question. He should vote for the Bill of the hon. Member for Liverpool, because his (Mr. Cross's) name was on the Bill when it was introduced in 1873. He had the misfortune to differ from the hon. Member for Yorkshire (Mr. Fielden) on is question when his name appeared on the Bill in the place of that of his lamented friend, formerly the Member for Liverpool, Mr. Graves. After the remark of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Anderson) that this was a Liverpool Bill, it was only right that he should state to the House that a short time ago a large deputation waited upon him at the Home Office from very nearly all the municipal corporations of England, strongly pressing upon the Government to take up this measure. On the part of the Government he declined to take up the measure; but, having given his opinion three years ago that better men would be obtained for the public service, and at lower salaries, and still adhering to that view, and believing also that a great saving would be effected to the public, he should, as an individual Member, support the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. M. T. BASS said, he wished to make a remark or two on what had fallen from the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) in reference to pensions for labourers. His hon. Friend doubtless knew many manufacturers who employed 2,000, 3,000, or even 5,000 men. He (Mr. Bass) employed only about 2,000; but he thought it would be hard if he were called upon one day to give pensions to every one of those 2,000 men. If the Bill were passed, he believed it would be employed for Party purposes, and that Liberals or Tories who happened to be in power in a corporation would avail themselves of the measure to grant good pensions to officers who had favoured their views. On all grounds he thought the measure a most injurious one to the public interests, and he should join the hon. Member for Yorkshire in opposing it.

PUBLICANS CERTIFICATES (SCOTLAND)

(Dr. Cameron, Sir Windham Anstruther, Mr. Ramsay, Mr. Mackintosh.)

SECOND READING.

Dr. CAMERON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to assimilate the law of Scotland relating to the granting of Licences to sell intoxicating Liquors to the Law of England. It was unnecessary to adduce any argument to show that the need for some reform of the licensing law had long been felt in Scotland. He believed that every Scotch Member would admit that such was the case, and he was certain the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department must have learned that it was so from the numerous deputations which from time to time had waited on him on the subject. There were two great defects in the Scotch method of granting licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The first of these consisted in the fact that there was an appeal from the licensing Courts to the county justices of the peace assembled in quarter sessions, and that the decisions in licensing cases of the burgh magistrates and the justices in petty sessions were liable to be overturned to any extent on appeal. The second grave defect in the Scottish system was that it permitted of canvassing and of bringing up the justices of the peace to vote in the Appeal Courts, a practice which had given rise to very great scandal. He did not propose to say anything about the latter result of the system, which was notorious; but in regard to the first-mentioned defect—that of allowing the justices in quarter sessions to overthrow the proceedings of the burgh licensing magistrates—he might state that he found from two Returns laid before the House two years ago, that in four years to which they referred, 223 licences, or one-seventh of the entire number of licences then in existence in Glasgow, were granted in that city by the justices in quarter sessions on appeal, after their refusal by the licensing magistrates of the city. Both these evils would be avoided under the English system. The first—the overturning of the decisions of the licensing magistrates—was avoided by the enactment that in the case of applications for new licences, a refusal on the part of the licensing magistrate was final. There was no appeal against their decision. The system of canvassing, which had excited so much dissatisfaction and comment in Scotland, was avoided under the English system by the institution of licensing committees, to whom was intrusted the responsibility of confirming the licences granted by the inferior Court. He proposed now to explain very briefly the working of the English system. Under it, as he had said, the local magistrates in Brewster Sessions were entitled to refuse absolutely all and any applications for new licences that might be brought before them, and no appeal existed against their decision. Each year a licensing committee of not more than 12 or less than three individuals was appointed by the quarter sessions, and to this committee was intrusted the responsibility of confirming such licences as might be granted by the inferior Courts. They could not increase the number of licences granted, because no appeal existed to them in the case of refusal; but they could restrict the number granted in case they thought the inferior Court had granted licences in too large numbers. In the burghs a joint licensing committee was intrusted with the same duties. This joint licensing committee was composed of three members nominated by the licensing committee of the county, and three members nominated by the licensing committee of the borough, and their functions were the same as those of the licensing committee of the counties. The essential difference, in fact, between the Scotch and English systems of granting licences was that the functions in Scotland of the Appellate Tribunal were, in practice, almost purely expansive, while in England they were purely restrictive. It might be asked, Why introduce all this machinery? Why not simply do away with appeals altogether? The suggestion had been made again and again by the corporations of the different towns of Scotland; but it was open to this great objection—that it would entail an alteration in the law which would seriously affect the interests of holders of existing licences, whereas by adopting the English system they would avoid the difficulty. Under the Bill before the House, the interests of the holders of existing licences would remain precisely as they now stood, and regulated by the same provisions as those that now existed. The system which had been adopted in England also possessed another advantage over the simple proposal to abolish appeals, and this advantage was that in case of the simple abolition of all appeal, the inferior Court of licensing magistrates would, if so disposed, have it in their power to grant any additional number of licences. In the working of the English system an effectual check was put upon the abuse of such a power by the existence of the licensing committees intrusted with the function of restricting the issue of licences to such a number as they might judge to be fitting. The present Bill was introduced and printed last year, so that ample time had been allowed for its discussion in Scotland. He would, therefore, ask the Government to allow it to be read a second time that evening; and, in the event of their considering it desirable that the country should express a further opinion in regard to its merits, he would postpone the Order for going into Committee until such date as would afford ample time for full consideration. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Cameron.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE: The Government are willing to consent to the second reading of this Bill. It originated, I believe, in a suggestion which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department made in a remark to a deputation that waited upon him last year. While the principle of the Bill is, in our opinion, correct, I venture to think there are some matters of detail, which it is unnecessary to specify at present, which may admit of some improvement in Committee. If necessary, we shall propose Amendments on the Bill and give every facility for considering them.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday 28th March.

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Whitwell.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. P. A. TAYLOR appealed to the hon. and learned Member for Salford, who had charge of the measure, not to press the Committee stage at so early a period after it had been read a second time. Under another name this Bill was in reality the Infanticide Bill of last Session, which had been opposed, and many persons then absent from the House were not, he believed, aware of the identity of the two measures. Further time, therefore, ought to be given to consider its provisions. He objected to the measure because, by diminishing the punishment for a particular class of offence, it sought to make it more probable that juries would find guilty those who were charged with that offence, which in itself was an unsound and unsatisfactory mode of legislation. When women were charged with infanticide, it was always a most painful and difficult task for juries to decide upon the case, as it was a well-known fact that women otherwise of sound mind might become absolutely irresponsible beings during and immediately after childbirth, and he therefore objected to the Bill on the ground of its too great severity, because it attempted to make juries find verdicts of guilty when they would otherwise not do so. He also objected to the Bill on the ground of its too great laxity, because when murder was proved it did not become a lesser offence when it was inflicted by a mother upon a child. He suggested to the House that it was altogether unusual that they should be asked to go into Committee upon such a Bill within a week of the opening of the Session.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN also opposed the Motion for going into Committee. He objected to the Bill because its title was misleading, because it created a new class of offence, and because it was a cruel measure, totally uncalled for by any facts before the House and the country; and he did not consider that Parliament would increase its dignity by voting for anything of the kind.

MR. CHARLEY said, that the Bill in its present form had passed through Committee last Session, and received the approval of the House and of the Prime Minister, who stated that it was a Bill which the House desired to pass. His reason for wishing to take the Committee so early was because it was most important that the House of Lords generally should have an opportunity of considering it fully. One of the Law Lords was to take charge of the Bill. The Bill was founded on the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment—four of the Commissioners being Members of the existing Cabinet—the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Derby, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Secretary of State for War, and another being the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). The Report of that Royal Commission was founded on the recommendations of many eminent Judges. The Bill had been read a second time on four occasions in this House without opposition, and the lawyers of the House, including the Recorder of the City of London, the Attorney General of the late, and the Attorney General of the present Government, and the hon. and learned Members for Durham, South Derbyshire, South Warwickshire, and Beaumaris—subject to certain Amendments—were unanimously in its favour. It was only towards the close of last Session that the measure, when it reached its final stage, experienced any opposition from the late hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance), whose loss as an old and respected Member of the House they all deplored. When it was considered that out of 51 murders, 50 were infanticides, it would be seen that it was most urgent that the matter should be dealt with by law, and that could not be done except on the lines of this Bill. In his opinion, no social question was of a more pressing nature, or more deserving of the immediate attention of a reformed Parliament.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT failed to see that any such Bill as that introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Salford was recommended in the Report of the Capital Punishment Commission. The Bill would inflict punishment unnecessarily severe. The Capital Punishment Commissioners contemplated cases where the death of the child had followed the grievous bodily harm inflicted, but here no mention was made of any death. The Bill also proposed to add a count for felonious wounding to a capital charge, but it was not right to give the jury an alternative, by which they might release themselves from finding on the charge for murder. He should to-morrow ask permission to introduce a Bill strictly following out the recommendations of the Commission, and particularly that portion of it by which the crime of infanticide could be dealt with, and therefore he appealed to the hon. and learned Member to allow his Bill to stand over for the present.

MR. LOPES also hoped that the Bill would not be pressed forward that evening, inasmuch as it would effect many alterations in the criminal law with respect to which further discussion was requisite. For his own part, he objected to piecemeal legislation on the subject of the criminal law. The chief object of the Bill was to create a new crime; but apart altogether from that, there were several of its provisions that were objectionable. One of its sections, for instance, proposed to repeal a portion of the Criminal Consolidation Acts, and for this and other reasons he should certainly oppose it.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD supported the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill. The question had been frequently and fully discussed, and all the facts connected with it freely announced. In reality, the Bill was a very simple one, although attempts had been made to mystify it. Any one who considered the present state of the law could not fail to arrive at the conclusion that an alteration was, to say the least of it, desirable. The Bill proposed to repeal the proviso contained in Section 60 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, which enabled a jury to find a woman guilty of concealment of birth upon an indictment for murder. Concealment of birth had nothing to do with the principal charge, and it was wrong to allow a jury to shirk the responsibility of deciding as to the offence to which the evidence pointed by finding the prisoner guilty of a different offence of which there might be but slight evidence. It was objected to the Bill that it created a new crime. But whether it were a new crime or a modification of a crime already known to the law mattered not, if it had the effect of getting rid of undue severity of the law on the one hand, and the uncertainty of conviction on the other. It was only the further development of a principle already known in the administration of the criminal law, by which a prisoner indicted for an attempt to commit a felony was not entitled to an acquittal because the evidence proved not only that he had been guilty of the attempt but also of the actual felony. At present, if on a charge of malicious wounding, the evidence proved not only that the wound was inflicted, but also caused death, the prisoner must be acquitted of that charge, but might be again indicted for murder; but under the present Bill the jury might convict of the malicious wounding though death might have been caused thereby, and the prisoner could not again be indicted for murder in respect of the same facts. That he believed to be a real improvement in the law. It lessened its severity, and rendered convictions more certain.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL joined in the appeal made to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Salford not to press on the measure at once, but to allow time for its consideration. His opinion was mainly in favour of the Bill, which, he thought, might in Committee be made a very useful measure. The subject with which the Bill dealt was of a very subtle character, and it required an intimate knowledge of the criminal law to enable hon. Members to understand it thoroughly. He believed if his hon. and learned Friend would yield to the appeal made to him from both sides of the House, he would find in the course of a short time that hon. Members would become well acquainted with the subject, and they would then see that the Bill was not deserving of the epithets which the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) had used towards it. He therefore joined in the appeal for a postponement.

MR. CHARLEY said, he had no desire to press the Bill with undue haste. His reason for bringing the measure forward so early in the Session was that last year it was kept in a state of suspended animation for two months, awaiting the third reading, and was at length dropped because there was not sufficient time left for its passage through the other House. In consequence of the appeal which had been made to him he would willingly postpone the Committee stage.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Friday.

COUNTY PALATINE OF LANCASTER (CLERK OF THE PEACE) BILL.

(Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Holt, Mr. Clifton.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HARDCASTLE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that from time immemorial the office of clerk of the peace of the County Palatine had been a sinecure, the duties being entirely performed by deputy; but in 1872 an Act of Parliament was passed by which, on the death of the then occupant of the office, who was still living, the sinecure clerkship was to be done away with, and a really active clerk of the peace appointed, and it was provided, in addition, that there should be two deputy clerks of the peace appointed by the Chancellor of the Duchy.

The Attorney General

The magistrates of the county, however, were unanimously of opinion that this last provision would not work well; that the two deputies appointed by the Chancellor would be practically independent local clerks of the peace, with whom the magistrates would have to deal instead of with one head clerk, and that there would necessarily be a divided responsibility which would be attended with great inconvenience both as regarded the criminal and civil business of the county. The Bill now before the House had been brought in with the approval of the justices, and it sought to repeal the clause empowering the Chancellor of the Duchy to appoint deputy clerks of the peace, and to enact that the appointment of those officers should be intrusted to the clerk of the peace himself, as was the case in all other counties.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hardcastle.)

MR. RATHBONE denied that any inconvenience had been shown to exist sufficient to justify a change in the present law, which was the result of a compromise, and was, he considered, a step in the right direction. It was a mistake to think that the sub-division of business which the hon. Member complained of did not exist in other counties. In Yorkshire the business of the county was much sub-divided, and it was the opinion of many able magistrates that sub-division should be carried to a greater extent in Lancashire also. The point to which the present Bill applied was, he admitted, not one of great public importance; but inasmuch as no adequate reasons had been assigned for changing the law, he moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. TORR seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

MR. ASSHETON supported the second reading, and stated that in 1875 the whole of the magistrates of Lancashire assembled at Preston and unanimously agreed to promote this Bill.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN, as a magistrate of Lancashire, felt bound to say that a large majority of the magistrates were anxious that the Bill should be passed.

(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: Mr. Speaker, I should have felt oppressed by the responsibility of so very grave a question having devolved upon a private Member, if it had not been for the remarkable history of a measure as to which I am, however unworthy, the mouthpiece of a preponderating public opinion—which sweeps in Churchmen generally, the entire Episcopate, the clergy, and, all but completely, the Government of the day. For this reason I can move the second reading of the Bill before the House with a great deal of confidence, even in the face of the extraordinary array of opposition which is to be brought against me. Many a man has trembled before a single opponent; but I have to deal with a three-headed opposition. First, there is, politically, my stern antagonist—personally, my hon. Friend in every way—the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). Then there is my hon. and learned, but candid Friend, the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), who wants what I want, only when it is offered to him he will not take it in the way I present it to him. Lastly, there is my hon. and gallant, but incomprehensible, Friend, the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot). In fact, Sir, it is not the "dogs of war," but the Cerberus of war that has been "let slip" upon me, while, as I learn, both hon. and learned Gentlemen have given place to the hon. and gallant Baronet—cedant armis togæ. I will not take up the time of the House by any arguments to show that an increase of the Episcopate is absolutely, I will not say essential, but most desirable for the well-being of the Church of England: that is a proposition which is accepted by everyone who wishes well to that Church. In some form or other, an increase of the Episcopate is most desirable. One single fact of itself proves that. The population of England has doubled during this century, and it is now five-fold what it was in the reign of King Henry VIII., and positively there has not been the addition of a single Bishop to the Episcopal bench since that time. It is true that we have gained Ripon and Manchester; but we have lost Bristol and Westminster.

This growing disproportion was recognized by a Bill which passed through both Houses of Parliament in 1869 for the creation of three additional Sees, and which only fell through at the latest stage; but the Bill which I am bringing forward is founded originally upon the Report of one of the most grave and important Commissions that ever sat on ecclesiastical matters—the Cathedral Commission—which was appointed in the year 1852, and which made its final Report in 1856. That Commission was appointed by the Conservative Government of the day, the first in which the present Prime Minister was Leader of this House, and in which my right hon. Colleague and Friend was Home Secretary, so that to him the Church owes a special debt of gratitude, which can hardly be sufficiently estimated, for having promoted the appointment of that Commission. The machinery for the creation of fresh Bishoprics, which the Commissioners recommended, is that which is embodied in the present measure. Twenty years further on, in 1872, a scheme similar to mine was recommended by a body which, however some people may say ought to be reformed, is, at the least, the most influential Committee of the clergy in the Country—the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury. That body, in 1872, put out a Report recommending a similar Bill. In the meantime, a strong demonstration had been made in favour of an increase of the Episcopate, in the shape of lay and clerical Memorials which were adopted in the year 1862, the clerical Memorial to Convocation having actually 6,000 signatures appended to it, whilst the names to the lay Memorial to Lord Palmerston included those of the present Prime Minister, of the present Lord Chancellor, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, the present First Lord of the Admiralty, the present Postmaster General, and the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex.

Such were the circumstances under which, in the year 1873, the question was again revived. My noble Friend, Lord Lyttelton, undertook to introduce the Bill in “another place,” and adopted the wise precaution of writing round to the Bench of Bishops, to ask if they stood to the recommendations of Convocation of the year before, and all of them, with two or three exceptions only, answered “Yes;” so that the Bill which I now bring forward has the direct and written approbation of almost the entire Episcopate. Besides these, about 450 rural deaneries—that is, the representation of nearly the entire Church in England—declared themselves in favour of an increase of the Episcopate. So armed, Lord Lyttelton was ready to have moved in 1874, but the Dissolution led him to postpone action. However, he brought in this Bill in “another place,” at the beginning of the last Session of Parliament, and the result was that it passed through every stage without a single Division, and with only one Amendment, which was a very marked improvement in it, and to which I shall have occasion to call attention when I come to the details of the Bill. It went through without a single Division; but its career was not without debate; and I may read the words of one for whom we all entertain a very great and sincere respect—the present very eminent and respected Archbishop of Canterbury. On the second reading of the Bill “elsewhere,” on the 23rd of February, 1875, the Archbishop began his speech with these words—

I pray the attention of the House to that word “practical”—it is in the eyes of the Archbishop, not a vague, but a “practical question”—and, continued the Archbishop—

“I should not be doing my duty if I did not, in fulfilment of the pledge I have given to him, express my hearty concurrence in the measure he has brought forward.”—[3 Hansard, cccxii. 733.]

So that I am bringing forward a Bill which has the “hearty concurrence” of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The third reading of the Bill was taken on the 16th of March, and on that occasion the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) who so ably represents Her Majesty’s Government in that exalted Assembly, said—

“The Government did not think it right to accept the responsibility of the measure, but, as he had stated, they did not oppose it.” [Ibid., 1867.]

The Government did not oppose the measure. Considering what the Bill is, I think I may claim that this is one of the cases in which it may be truly said that those who are not against us are with us. If Her Majesty’s Government did not oppose so important a Bill as this, though brought in upon private responsibility, we may conclude that it went very near indeed towards approving of it.

Mr. Beresford Hope

That ends the history of the Bill "elsewhere." I was then invited to take it up in this House. There was a debate on the second reading, when a hearty speech was made in its favour by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. The House was ready to have divided on the main question, when three Divisions were taken on Motions of Adjournment, which were meant to obstruct, if not to prevent the passing of the Bill, and there were in each case decided majorities on the side of the supporters of the measure, which, as everyone knew represented the division of opinion within the House on the question itself. I would call the attention of the Treasury Bench to my reason for not moving the second reading till the month of May, though the Bill had passed the House of Lords in March. In the meantime, Her Majesty's Government had brought in the St. Albans Bishopric Bill. I was, therefore, anxious not to interpose, even, a seeming obstacle to the passage of that measure. I might have pressed forward my Bill with a better chance of its passing; but as Her Majesty's Government had made their contribution—a small and local one, it is true, yet a tangible one—to the increase of the Episcopate, I determined not to stand in their light, and the result was that, in helping them with their Bill, I lost the opportunity of carrying my own that Session. That is the reason for the course I then took, while I believed that, as I had helped them, so I have a right to look for their help. And here I may state that I do not look upon any Bill for creating single Sees—be it for Cornwall, or Liverpool, or Halifax, or any other place—as in any way antagonistic to my measure. It will, as I shall proceed to show, make all such special Bills wholly unnecessary; and if Her Majesty's Government, or anyone else, pleases to bring in such special Bills they will have my support. It will, at any rate be an addition to the Episcopate. It will not be a general measure; and a general measure will remain as much a necessity as ever for the great margin of country which the special Bills have not covered. I put the Bill often on the Notice Paper, and the oftener I did so the more vexed seemed my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea at the zeal on my part to give him the opportunity, which I thought would be gratifying to him, of letting us know what he thought of the measure. So we came on the end of the Session, and the two last divisions of that Session were upon this Bill, as will be the second one of the present Session. In fact, the two Bills have followed each other so rapidly that we may look upon them as almost the realization of the day-dream of the Reformers of our Parliamentary procedure, who wish to carry on the unfinished Business of one Session into another. The second of these two last divisions was on the Main Question, and that was carried by 54 to 23, or a majority of more than two to one. Here I have to express my thanks to the Members of Her Majesty's Government in this House for the large and satisfactory numbers in which they appeared in those five divisions. The great majority of the Members of the Government having seats in this House voted for me from one to five times; and not one voted against me. It would be invidious to mention names; only I may say that, among those Members of the Government were the four Law Officers of the Crown then in Parliament, of whom the present Attorney General appeared not less than five times. I cite that fact as an answer to those who try to make out that the Bill I bring forward is a vague and an unworkable measure. I do not believe that the Law Officers of any Government in Parliament would all of them have voted for a Bill, if they were not fully satisfied that it was one that would work consistently with the statute law of the Realm.

This is the history of the Bill down to the close of the Session of 1875; and with such antecedents I have this year no option but to bring in the Bill literatim as it passed the House of Lords, and made some progress in this House last year. It would be disrespectful to those who then gave it their support; it would be disrespectful to the Archbishop of Canterbury; it would be disrespectful to Her Majesty's Government; above all, it would be disrespectful to this House, if I had not given it an opportunity of considering the Bill, line for line and word for word, in the form in which it received the approval of the House last Session. Having done so, I discharge my duty in moving that the Bill be read a second time to-day. It will then come under the scrutiny of a Committee of the Whole House; and in reference to that, I wish to say that I am open to consider in the most candid and friendly spirit any Amendment that may be suggested, whether it comes from one side of the House or the other. I am not irrevocably wedded to the Bill in the shape in which it stands, though I think I can give adequate reasons why it should pass in that shape. My only wish and desire will be to send it to "another place," and to help it on to the Statute Book, in as perfect and useful a shape as it can be possibly made to assume. I suppose that the House is sufficiently familiar with the general outline of the Bill. It is emphatically an enabling Bill. It is not a Bill to make one or more specific Sees. It is simply a Bill to provide an easier and cheaper machinery whereby, through private munificence, a larger number of Sees may be created than at present exist; and for that purpose, it brings into play the machinery which is most familiar to us in connection with questions relating to the Church—the Ecclesiastical Commission, who will have to prepare the scheme and to see that the funds provided by private munificence are sufficient to put the scheme in operation consistently with the present framework of the Episcopate. The Ecclesiastical Commission is prevented from giving any money for the creation of a new See; and before it can promote a scheme, it must be satisfied that there is money enough forthcoming to carry out the object. Then the scheme has to go before the Queen in Council, and afterwards it will have to be for a certain time upon the Table of both Houses. All possible safeguards are provided against abuse: in fact, the Bill bristles with safeguards, against any risk of its tending to scatter Bishoprics broadcast over the land. There is one provision and only one in respect of which the Bill came out of the House of Lords in a form different from that in which it was introduced there—that is the clause which we owe to a right rev. Prelate, whose zeal and energy every one will gladly admit, the very able, active and devoted Bishop of Exeter. Those who are familiar with the history of the re-arrangement of Sees initiated by Sir Robert Peel know that with a few exceptions, the incomes of all the Bishoprics have been fixed at between £5,000 and £4,200 in view of the supposed expensiveness, in the way of outgoings in each diocese. Clause 11 of the Bill allows a Bishop to alienate a portion of his income towards a new See to be carried out of his diocese, while no doubt there is an understanding that this concession should not be taken to allow of a diminution below the lowest existing figure. Nothing could be more reasonable, safe and conservative than this provision so limited. Some persons may think that £3,000 or £3,500 a-year would be enough to maintain a Bishop in his social rank and position. I am not here either to contest or to support that opinion. My Bill contains nothing which can be used for or against it, for it leaves the question of the sufficient income to the action of the executive authorities in each particular case.

This, then, is the Bill which has been called a vague one, because it does not recite any particular Sees to be created. Why, I never heard of such a misuse of a word as of this word "vague" in the present instance. What is it, let me ask, that has produced the extraordinary development of church building, the creation of new parishes and new endowments, followed by the erection of thousands of schools all over the country? Why, the series of Church Building Acts which have been passed from time to time since 1818, every one of which is a vague Act in the sense in which the term has been applied to my Bill. It is vague, simply because it does not recite new Sees to be created. It says that, where there is a proved grievance, the proved grievance may be met and remedied under certain well-considered conditions; and it brings in the highest authorities in State and Church as umpires and arbiters to decide whether a want is proved, and the remedy proposed is a proper one. So far as the Forms of the House will allow me to do so, I call as my witness to the efficiency of the Bill a Return which was ordered in "another place" at the instance of one who was long well known in this House as Sir John Pakington, now Lord Hampton, of churches built or restored at a cost exceeding £500 since 1840. That Return shows that millions upon millions have been given to the Church by private hands in the way of building and restoration. Who can doubt that this material, enormous increase of Church property owes its direct impulse to those vague

Church Building Acts; so, to put the matter on the most practical basis, I do not see why this "vague" Bill of mine should not produce analogous results in the multiplication of the higher pastorate—the Episcopate of the Church of England. At the same time, as I have said, I am willing, and not only willing, but anxious, to consider any friendly Amendments which may be proposed in Committee; not Amendments which, like the kiss and the sword of Joab are intended to smite the Bill, as it were, under the fifth rib; but such Amendments as are honestly proposed to make it more efficient and useful. And here I would call the attention of the Treasury Bench to one Amendment that has occurred to me as being perfectly consistent with the intention and object of the Bill, which would neither cripple its efficiency, nor stiffen its elasticity, whilst it would give full effect to all its beneficial intentions. One mischievous result which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex may anticipate, is the creation of Bishoprics without areas or populations sufficient to justify the proceeding. Now, in reference to that point, I have no objection to insert a Proviso that no new See shall be created of a less area than an entire county, or some portion of a county, with a given minimum of population, it being further provided that the residuary See or Sees should fulfil the same conditions. In short, the whole county of Northumberland, or a substantive portion of the West Riding of Yorkshire, might be made a new Bishopric; but it would be impossible to tender a scheme for a new See in the shape of a circle of 10 miles round a favoured spot, the Bishop of which would be something like the private chaplain of the munificent and magnificent founder. It would be a misfortune if the Bill were to be worked in that way; but although there are, as I believe, already, ample safeguards in it against the occurrence of such an abuse, I have no objection to meet the wish for a precise enactment, by providing that there shall be such minimum of area and of population. It may be a healing balm for my hon. and gallant Friend, that, under this Proviso, he need not be afraid of being over-Bishoped in his county of Sussex. You could not cut up that county into new Bishoprics until Brighton, Eastbourne, Hastings and other towns had grown much larger than they are at present, or to such a size as they are not likely to reach in our life-time. There is another provision which has been suggested to meet the case—that of a Schedule to the Bill specifying the new Sees which are to be created. Candidly, I must say that I do not think such a provision would be so desirable as the suggestion which I have just thrown out. In the first place, such a provision would, as it seems to me, ignore the element of human nature; for the Bill appeals to private munificence, and we all know the justifiable pride which a man takes in being the originator of a great and good work; it appears to me, therefore, that if there were a Schedule of the kind attached to the Bill, it would be very likely to take away the personal glory of initiating new Sees. That is my first objection to a Schedule. My other objection is less sentimental and more practical in its character. I think you would find yourselves in a great difficulty when you came to arrange the Schedule and define the places where new Sees should be created. You do not want to be bringing in a Bill every successive Parliament; and if the Schedule is to be a comprehensive one, its framers would have to forecast the condition of England 40 or 50 years hence, and I think that a complete Schedule of all the Sees which it would be a desirable thing to possess, say, in the year 1900, would rather startle the House, and make it think that the measure was a more speculative one than it really was. On the other hand, if your Schedule was a small one, how could you choose between pretty equal claimants? This is my second objection to the Schedule. In the present condition of England, with Durham having a population that approaches to 700,000; with Northumberland approaching to 400,000; the West Riding of Yorkshire nearing 2,000,000; our rural Warwickshire—the forest-land of Shakspeare and the Elizabethan poets—now inhabited by a great teeming population, town and country, of nearly 700,000; my own county of Stafford, with a population rising 900,000; with an aspect so varied as the Black Country in the south and the mountain district in the north, where you may fancy yourselves on the Moors of Scotland; Derby, with its 400,000 people, and Nottingham with its 300,000; with all these claims upon you, how, I ask, could you make your selection? Any selection of seats for new Bishoprics must be invidious. If, then, all parts of the country are to be gratified, you had better follow the principle which has governed appointments to the public service for so many years, and let there be a competitive examination. Have your enabling Bill, and let those localities have new Sees which show, by their energy and munificence, that they are most deserving of them. I have now stated the grounds upon which I doubt the expediency of a Bill with a Schedule, though I think that a Bill with a well-considered Schedule would be better than no Bill at all. But an enabling Bill, such as that which I am moving, with a limitation of area and population, such as I now submit to the House, would be a more elastic, and, I believe, quite as efficacious a way of working the matter. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT, in rising, according to Notice, to move the Previous Question, said he had to thank the hon. Members for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) and for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) for having kindly given way to him on the present occasion. He humbly ventured to think that by moving the Previous Question he best met the requirements of the present case. The hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) had described his Bill as one for increasing the Episcopate; but his (Sir Walter Barttelot's) Amendment was by no means directed against that object, and the hon. Member was perfectly accurate when he said that he who now moved the Previous Question was in favour of the increase of the Episcopate in 1873. He was not only in favour of increasing the Episcopate in 1873, but he was of that opinion at the present moment. [Mr. HEYGATE: Then why oppose the Bill?] His hon. Friend said, then why oppose the Bill? and his answer was, he opposed it because he thought it a very bad one; but his hon.

Friend could get up and support it if he thought proper. He (Sir Walter Barttelot) thought that the Government possessed ample power to increase the Episcopate by bringing in a Bill for that purpose whenever they thought it necessary to take such a step. He had shown what his opinion was on this question of the increase of the Episcopate by the vote in favour of the St. Albans Bill, which was carried by a majority of 273 against the minority of 61, who voted with the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. H. Richard) on his Motion for its rejection. The result of that decision showed that the general opinion of the House was strongly in favour of an increase in the Episcopate, when it was clearly shown by those who were responsible in that House for the management—he would say boldly—of the affairs relating to the Church, and whose duty it was to introduce Bills upon this important subject, that it was desirable that such an increase should be made. The hon. Member had in his speech modified his Bill very materially, and finding that it was too loosely drawn he was prepared, should the measure get into Committee, to move some important Amendments in it, and thus reduce his scheme to one which might be brought in by the Government for erecting a new Bishopric. If the Bill was not intended to create a number of new Bishoprics, the matter had better be left in the hands of the Government rather than of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. What had been the history of this Bill? It was perfectly true that it had come down to the House from "another place" last year; but it could scarcely be said that it had met with an enthusiastic reception in that "other place;" indeed, its reception was of the coldest character possible, and to show that the hon. Member had been afraid of the position of the Bill he had, he would not say used un-Parliamentary language, because in his most courteous speech, he had stated the case most fairly, fully, and frankly, but he had taken a step with regard to the second reading of the Bill which he regretted, and which the hon. Member himself would regret when he came to look back upon it. He denied that the great majority of the people in this country were in favour of the Bill, although no doubt those who had considered the matter would be in favour of an increase in the Episcopate.

Mr. Beresford Hope

His hon. Friend the Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) had inserted in a local newspaper, which circulated in three counties, under different headings, a notice asking for Petitions in favour of this Bill, but it appeared to have met with no response. He wanted to know where were the Petitions which were to show that the majority of the people in this country were in favour of the measure? It was impossible in a matter of this kind to separate the laity from the clergy, and it would be most mischievous to attempt to do so. The laity were willing to work hand and heart with the clergy of the church, but the clergy must bow to the decision of that House, and it was for that House and the people, and not merely for the clergy, to say when Bills of this character were brought in, whether they ought to pass or not. He objected to this measure, because it proposed to place in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners a power which he did not think should be intrusted to them. He had every respect for his right hon. Friend (Mr. Mowbray) sitting on his left, and for the Body to which he belonged, but he doubted whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would desire to have this grave and important responsibility of deciding what new Bishoprics should be created thrust upon them; because if they accepted it, they would have schemes without number from all sorts of places pressed upon them, and they would never be free from importunity of one kind or another. The hon. Member for Cambridge University said he (Sir Walter Barttelot) ought to be satisfied with this Bill, because under it Sussex could not be divided into different dioceses; but, as the Bill now stood, if Brighton were to raise the necessary funds, and were to ask to be made the seat of a new Bishopric, there was nothing in the Bill to prevent the Ecclesiastical Commissioners from acceding to the proposal. Was it wise to give the Ecclesiastical Commissioners power to create an enormous number of Bishoprics? True it was that the hon. Member proposed that the schemes should lie upon the Table of the House for 42 days before they came into force; but surely that in itself would give rise to much evil, inasmuch as it would afford an opportunity for those who were opposed to the Church to say much in its disparagement. In his opinion, it would be better to let things go on as they were, because no good would result from thus tampering with the old constitution of the Church, which had done such wonders in the land during the last 300 years. He objected to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners having power to divide the present Sees, and to parcel out the old historic Bishoprics of this country. It would be preposterous, monstrous, and most mischievous if it were easier to set up a new Diocese than to procure the inclosure of a common. He had heard with surprise the hon. Member state that there was a provision in the Bill that no Bishopric that was created or that was divided should have a less income attached to it than £4,200, for, as he read the measure, there was nothing in it to prevent the Ecclesiastical Commissioners from creating a Bishopric with an income of £1,500, or even less. Another objectionable feature in the Bill was the clause that provided that the new Bishops to be created under this Bill were not to have seats in the House of Lords until after the lapse of a certain time. The result of that provision would be that they would not get into the Upper House until they were too old to be of any practical use there, and such a circumstance would go far to justify those who sought to exclude the Bishops from the House of Lords. Having thus touched upon some of the chief objections to the measure, he now asked whether there was any necessity for such a measure as this at all? For his own part, he was ignorant that there was any universal demand for the large increase in the Episcopate which this Bill was intended to provide for. Her Majesty's Government, he need scarcely say, would meet with the most cordial support in the event of their introducing a measure for the increase of the Episcopate in particular cases; they had already created one new Bishopric, and they were now prepared to bring in Bills to create new Dioceses in Cornwall and Yorkshire, but he was of opinion that such Bills should be brought in on the responsibility of the Government alone. When the hon. Member referred to the necessity that existed for creating a new Bishopric for Northumberland, he appeared to forget that a Conservative Government would not refuse to take all necessary steps that the interests of the Church might require. In the belief, therefore, that the sure, sound, and honest way to deal with this question was to call upon the Government to fulfil their duties in the matter, which they were prepared and were willing to perform; and in the belief that this Bill was unnecessary and mischievous, he begged to move the Amendment that stood in his name.

Mr. MONK, in rising to second the Amendment, said, he entirely adopted the principle that underlay it—namely, that any Bill on the subject should be introduced by Her Majesty's Government. Provided the necessity for it were shown, he was by no means opposed to the increase in the Episcopate, as his vote on the St. Albans Bill of last year sufficiently proved; but he objected altogether to placing in the hands of a body like the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for whom personally he had the highest respect, a sort of roving Commission for making new Bishoprics and dividing Sees over the length and breadth of the land. There might have been a good excuse for the noble Lord (Lord Lyttelton) who introduced this measure into the House of Lords last year, because then there was a general desire among Churchmen that certain Sees, such as those of Rochester and Winchester, should be divided, and there were no means for doing so; but that desire had been met by the introduction of the St. Albans Bill, which was admitted on all hands to be a good measure, and one calculated to fulfil the object in view. In his opinion, as he had said, the responsibility of bringing forward schemes for the creation of new Sees should rest with the Government. The hon. Member for Cambridge University had told the House that there was a preponderating feeling of public opinion throughout the country in favour of this Bill, but he had yet to learn from the Petitions presented to the House in reference to it that such was the case. The hon. Member also said that Her Majesty's Government and the Bishops, with a single exception, were in favour of the Bill last year—[Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: I said, with a few exceptions]; he thanked the hon. Member for the correction, and would further say that Lord Lyttelton in his speech complained of the treatment the measure had received at the hands both of the Government and of the Episcopal Bench, and predicted that if it did not receive a more hearty support from the Government in the House of Commons, it would stand but a small chance of passing. A Cabinet Minister had stated last year that the Government were neither prepared to support the Bill nor to oppose it; but he thought that the House was entitled to the advice of Her Majesty's Government upon it. If this power were transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the whole matter would be left in the hands of two or three of the members of that Body, or perhaps of their secretary, the scheme would be presented to the Privy Council and receive its sanction as a matter of course, and when it reached that House Her Majesty's Government would find themselves virtually pledged to support it. If this measure were agreed to, the right of Parliament to declare whether or not there should be an increase in the Episcopate would be taken away altogether, and the question would be determined by an irresponsible body. Seeing that the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) had so fully explained the objection to the Bill, he should not trespass further upon the attention of the House, only to say that he could not join his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) in his reasons for not passing the measure, and that he should content himself with seconding the Amendment.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, that after the able manner in which his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) had stated his reasons for an increase in the Episcopate, and after the admissions made by his hon. Friends who opposed the Bill, he felt some scruples in taking up the time of the House in supporting it. The facts of the country spoke for themselves. An increase in the Episcopate had been felt ever since the Church awoke from her slumbers in the last century. There had been development of old and the growth of new centres of population, and there had been a vast increase in the numbers of the people, and of the clergy, and the parochial system. Episcopacy was the corner-stone of Church government, and now that the more pressing needs of the Church, in creating new districts had been accomplished, the necessity for an increase of Bishops had become more and more felt. He would be one of the last men to advocate for an increase of Bishops without clergy, but he might just state that the first church which the present Archbishop of Canterbury consecrated in the diocese of London was the 200th after the appointment of Bishop Bloomfield to the See, the whole of which had been built by voluntary subscriptions, the commencement of which had been inaugurated by that lamented Prelate; and what had been done since in the country generally was in the memory of all of them. In the days of their forefathers the idea regarding a Bishop was that he was an elaborate and expensive piece of Church furniture, not to be approached too closely by common eyes, and not to have much dealing with the clergy, but rather to spend his time in writing elaborate treatises on Divinity in his study, or on the Greek particles or Greek plays. But that was all changed now, and there was an increased activity going on in all the parishes of the country; and where Church work was going on, it was considered proper that the Bishop should visit the parish, and see what it was and give his sanction to it. The duties, indeed, had become so heavy that even men with iron constitutions like the Bishop of Exeter had to confess that they were unable to perform them. It was said that the laity did not feel that there was any want of more Bishops; but the clergy felt it, because they saw the great necessity of it. For instance, out of 477 clergymen, 468 had petitioned for this increase of Bishops. The hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. H. Richard) last year objected to any increase of what he called political ecclesiastical functionaries, and he indulged on the occasion of the passing of the St. Albans Bill in the pastime of the vivisection of the Church of England; and the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) also objected to the Bill last year, on the ground that Parliament ought to judge for itself on each separate case; but he thought those objections to the Bill would not be well founded now, especially after the proposal now made that a new See should be limited to a county or to part of a county containing a large population.

If we had had more Bishops we would not have so many critics indulging in that sort of pastime which he would call the vivisection of Ritualistic and other differences among Churchmen, for our Bishops would have had time to put down irregularities by authority, and many scandals would thus have been avoided. He could not agree with those hon. Members who seemed to wish that the Church should become intolerable, and thus bring about a separation between Church and State. A further objection to the Bill that it did not contain a provision that the income of a new Bishopric should not be less than £4,200 would be obviated in Committee, because the promoters of the measure were quite willing that a clause to that effect should be inserted in it. There could be no doubt the income would be provided, and willingly too, if the Bill passed. He hoped that the House of Commons would not on that occasion listen to those who might desire to get rid of the Bill. Parliament took the view of the Church of England, which had been well expressed by the leading journal that morning. It said the Church of England was—

There remained only the question whether the Government should take this question up. No doubt, they should; but it was too much to ask them to do so until public opinion had been brought to bear upon them. He thought, however, that this discussion and the support the measure had received might encourage the Government to introduce a Bill on the subject.

MR. J. P. C. STARKIE supported the Motion of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot). We wanted Bishops very much in this country, but as the course now being taken was likely to impede the appointment of Bishops, he thought the less evil would be to allow Government to take its own course and bring in a Bill, as was done in the case of St. Albans, which should be submitted to the whole country, because the country would be less jealous of proceeding in that way than in the way proposed by the hon. Member for Cambridge University.

sound, and honest way to deal with this question was to call upon the Government to fulfil their duties in the matter, which they were prepared and were willing to perform; and in the belief that this Bill was unnecessary and mischievous, he begged to move the Amendment that stood in his name.

Mr. MONK, in rising to second the Amendment, said, he entirely adopted the principle that underlay it—namely, that any Bill on the subject should be introduced by Her Majesty's Government. Provided the necessity for it were shown, he was by no means opposed to the increase in the Episcopate, as his vote on the St. Albans Bill of last year sufficiently proved; but he objected altogether to placing in the hands of a body like the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for whom personally he had the highest respect, a sort of roving Commission for making new Bishoprics and dividing Sees over the length and breadth of the land. There might have been a good excuse for the noble Lord (Lord Lyttleton) who introduced this measure into the House of Lords last year, because then there was a general desire among Churchmen that certain Sees, such as those of Rochester and Winchester, should be divided, and there were no means for doing so; but that desire had been met by the introduction of the St. Albans Bill, which was admitted on all hands to be a good measure, and one calculated to fulfil the object in view. In his opinion, as he had said, the responsibility of bringing forward schemes for the creation of new Sees should rest with the Government. The hon. Member for Cambridge University had told the House that there was a preponderating feeling of public opinion throughout the country in favour of this Bill, but he had yet to learn from the Petitions presented to the House in reference to it that such was the case. The hon. Member also said that Her Majesty's Government and the Bishops, with a single exception, were in favour of the Bill last year—[Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: I said, with a few exceptions]; he thanked the hon. Member for the correction, and would further say that Lord Lyttleton in his speech complained of the treatment the measure had received at the hands both of the Government and of the Episcopal Bench, and predicted that if it did not receive a more hearty support from the Government in the House of Commons, it would stand but a small chance of passing. A Cabinet Minister had stated last year that the Government were neither prepared to support the Bill nor to oppose it; but he thought that the House was entitled to the advice of Her Majesty's Government upon it. If this power were transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the whole matter would be left in the hands of two or three of the members of that Body, or perhaps of their secretary, the scheme would be presented to the Privy Council and receive its sanction as a matter of course, and when it reached that House Her Majesty's Government would find themselves virtually pledged to support it. If this measure were agreed to, the right of Parliament to declare whether or not there should be an increase in the Episcopate would be taken away altogether, and the question would be determined by an irresponsible body. Seeing that the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) had so fully explained the objection to the Bill, he should not trespass further upon the attention of the House, only to say that he could not join his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) in his reasons for not passing the measure, and that he should content himself with seconding the Amendment.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, that after the able manner in which his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) had stated his reasons for an increase in the Episcopate, and after the admissions made by his hon. Friends who opposed the Bill, he felt some scruples in taking up the time of the House in supporting it. The facts of the country spoke for themselves. An increase in the Episcopate had been felt ever since the Church awoke from her slumbers in the last century. There had been development of old and the growth of new centres of population, and there had been a vast increase in the numbers of the people, and of the clergy, and the parochial system. Episcopacy was the corner-stone of Church government, and now that the more pressing needs of the Church, in creating new districts had been accomplished, the necessity for an increase of Bishops had become more and more felt. He would be one of the last men to advocate for an increase of Bishops without clergy, but he might just state that the first church which the present Archbishop of Canterbury consecrated in the diocese of London was the 200th after the appointment of Bishop Bloomfield to the See, the whole of which had been built by voluntary subscriptions, the commencement of which had been inaugurated by that lamented Prelate; and what had been done since in the country generally was in the memory of all of them. In the days of their forefathers the idea regarding a Bishop was that he was an elaborate and expensive piece of Church furniture, not to be approached too closely by common eyes, and not to have much dealing with the clergy, but rather to spend his time in writing elaborate treatises on Divinity in his study, or on the Greek particles or Greek plays. But that was all changed now, and there was an increased activity going on in all the parishes of the country; and where Church work was going on, it was considered proper that the Bishop should visit the parish, and see what it was and give his sanction to it. The duties, indeed, had become so heavy that even men with iron constitutions like the Bishop of Exeter had to confess that they were unable to perform them. It was said that the laity did not feel that there was any want of more Bishops; but the clergy felt it, because they saw the great necessity of it. For instance, out of 477 clergymen, 468 had petitioned for this increase of Bishops. The hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. H. Richard) last year objected to any increase of what he called political ecclesiastical functionaries, and he indulged on the occasion of the passing of the St. Albans Bill in the pastime of the vivisection of the Church of England; and the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) also objected to the Bill last year, on the ground that Parliament ought to judge for itself on each separate case; but he thought those objections to the Bill would not be well founded now, especially after the proposal now made that a new See should be limited to a county or to part of a county containing a large population.

If we had had more Bishops we would not have so many critics indulging in that sort of pastime which he would call the vivisection of Ritualistic and other differences among Churchmen, for our Bishops would have had time to put down irregularities by authority, and many scandals would thus have been avoided. He could not agree with those hon. Members who seemed to wish that the Church should become intolerable, and thus bring about a separation between Church and State. A further objection to the Bill that it did not contain a provision that the income of a new Bishopric should not be less than £4,200 would be obviated in Committee, because the promoters of the measure were quite willing that a clause to that effect should be inserted in it. There could be no doubt the income would be provided, and willingly too, if the Bill passed. He hoped that the House of Commons would not on that occasion listen to those who might desire to get rid of the Bill. Parliament took the view of the Church of England, which had been well expressed by the leading journal that morning. It said the Church of England was—

There remained only the question whether the Government should take this question up. No doubt, they should; but it was too much to ask them to do so until public opinion had been brought to bear upon them. He thought, however, that this discussion and the support the measure had received might encourage the Government to introduce a Bill on the subject.

MR. J. P. C. STARKIE supported the Motion of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot). We wanted Bishops very much in this country, but as the course now being taken was likely to impede the appointment of Bishops, he thought the less evil would be to allow Government to take its own course and bring in a Bill, as was done in the case of St. Albans, which should be submitted to the whole country, because the country would be less jealous of proceeding in that way than in the way proposed by the hon. Member for Cambridge University.

Mr. MOWBRAY said, he did not advocate this Bill in any sense as an Ecclesiastical Commissioner. He should deprecate the amount of labour which the passing of the Bill would throw upon him in that capacity; but, viewing this Bill as a Churchman, he felt it his duty to give his cordial support to its second reading. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) advised the House not to discuss this question or legislate upon it, but to leave it to be dealt with by the Government. He (Mr. Mowbray) regretted to hear such sentiments expressed by a Conservative Member. This question was not merely fit for discussion, but ripe for legislation. It was a question on which the most thoughtful members of the Church had arrived at a deliberate conclusion. His hon. and gallant Friend said that the views of the clergy alone should not be adopted on this matter, but that the wishes of the laity, as well as of the clergy, should be consulted. He (Mr. Mowbray) entirely assented to that. This was a matter on which the opinions of the clergy and the laity who had thought on the subject had arrived at the same conclusion. The House was asked not to bow to the views of the clergy, but to carry out the wishes, generally speaking, of the members of the Church of England. He was greatly surprised to hear any doubt expressed on the Ministerial side of the House as to the necessity for increasing the Episcopate. In the reign of Henry VIII. six Sees were created and 10 more were promised; but during the last 330 years, notwithstanding the great increase of the population, practically only one addition had been made to the number of our Bishops. When Lord John Russell was at the head of the Government three more Sees were to be founded. Had that promise been fulfilled? Only one Bishopric, that of Manchester, was erected in 1847. In 1867 a Bill for the erection of three new Sees actually passed both Houses, but fell through at the last moment upon questions of detail, when it went back from this House to the House of Lords. While there had been only one addition to the number of our Bishops since the Reformation, making them 28, our Church population had become five or six times larger. What had the Church of Rome been doing in this country?

The Roman Catholics in this country did not amount to 2,000,000, but they had 16 Bishops and an Archbishop. What was the case of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States? It was a voluntary Church, and was not above 90 years old. What was the number of its Bishops? Fifty-eight; more than twice the number of the Bishops in the Church of England, whose members were five times the number of the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. What had happened in the Colonial Church during the same time? Fifty years ago there were, perhaps, half-a-dozen Bishops in the Colonies, now there were upwards of 60 Colonial Bishops. That showed what voluntary organization could do to promote the efficiency of the Church and to increase the number of Bishops in proportion to the number of the clergy and laity of the Church. He thought this was a matter which eminently deserved the attention of the House and the Government, and that there could be no more favourable moment than the present for dealing with it. The Church had reason to expect that a Conservative Government and a Conservative Parliament would do something to remedy an evil which had been admitted for 40 years, and which successive Governments had promised to meet. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) said this was a sort of measure which ought to originate with the Government. He (Mr. Mowbray) entirely agreed with his hon. Friend. He wished the Government would take it up. He quite admitted that until the Government did take it up, it was not likely that it could be forced through Parliament. Under this Bill a scheme for the creation of a Bishopric would have to be submitted to the House and receive the sanction of Parliament, and that was the answer to those who argued that a separate Bill should be brought in on every occasion when it was thought expedient to create a Bishopric. He thought every Churchman would admit that there was a necessity for an increase of the Episcopate. He admitted that if he had brought in a Bill on this subject he would not have introduced it in the shape in which his hon. Friend had brought in this Bill, and that there was some force in many of the objections made to this Bill, but his hon. Friend had told the House the circumstances under which this Bill came before them. The principle for which he was about to vote was that contained in the Preamble—namely, that it was desirable that new Sees should be created in England and Wales.

Mr. DILLWYN, who had given Notice that he would move the rejection of the Bill, but who had given way to the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot), said, he had mingled with different classes of society, and had not heard any general desire expressed for the increase of the Episcopate. On the contrary, the general opinion was, he thought, that if any extension of the Church was required, it was not among the highly-paid officials, but rather among the poor curates and the working clergy. He did not believe that the connection between the Church of England and the State would long be maintained. He looked around him and saw the Nonconformists not decreasing, but, he believed, increasing. ["Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] In his (Mr. Dillwyn's) own part of the country, at least, there could be no doubt that they were increasing. Assuming, however, that they remained in statu quo, he was not aware that there was any diminution in their antagonism to Church, not as a religious community, but as a State institution. The Church of England was torn with dissensions, and there was an existing rancour which was unparalleled. If he wanted to find specimens of evil speaking he looked into the Church newspapers, and, looking at all these influences, he did not think the day far distant when the connection between Church and State would be severed. He certainly thought that day would come, and he objected to see high-class officials increased in the Church. He objected to it for this reason—those who had had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) last year could not forget the charges which he had made against the Church, with reference to the Irish Church disestablishment, and those charges had never been refuted; and if the disestablishment of the English Church should come—as come it surely would, he had little doubt but that a similar proceeding of obtaining undue compensation would be repeated. He thought it most ungracious in the promoters of this Bill to ask the House of Commons to delegate its powers to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Let the House have the whole scheme before them, and let them see what was to be done. It was proposed by the Bill to give a power to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to increase the number of Bishops and to divide the dioceses of England and Wales. The authority of Parliament was proposed to be taken away by such a step as that. No doubt the scheme would be laid before Parliament for six weeks or more, to consider its provisions, but what security had Parliament that the Bill would not be swept through towards the end of the Session? They all knew what was done in "the small hours" towards the end of a Session, and that when it became a question "Aye" or "No" whether a Bill should pass, undesirable measures were not unfrequently swept through Parliament. This was a question of great importance, and was one which should be taken up by the Government, and not left to Ecclesiastical Commissioners or private Members. He submitted, in conclusion, that he should be very sorry if Her Majesty's Government were prepared to aid in delegating the authority of Parliament to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and in taking from Parliament the powers which it possessed and ought to maintain. They ought not to shirk their responsibility, and upon those grounds he should heartily support the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD said, he thought the Bill was one which ought to meet with the support of both sides of the House. It was a Bill which only proposed to place the National Church, in relation to its own government, on the same ground as every other Church and religious denomination was placed. It was a Bill which it was surprising to find hon. Gentlemen, who in other respects professed to be the advocates of religious liberty and toleration, opposed to. It had been truly said by the right hon. Member for the Oxford University (Mr. Mowbray), that the population of this country was now infinitely larger than it was at the time of the Reformation; and he (Mr. Hubbard) held that it was time that the Church of England should have a power delegated to it to increase its Episcopacy, in relation to the increased number of the members of the Church. Regarding the Church of England as a National Church, he thought the assent of Parliament ought to be given to a measure, the object of which was to give to the Church a power to do its own work; and in asking for that power, the Church did not ask for any increase of its income, whether from the Consolidated Fund or otherwise. It was prepared by the liberality of its own members to find the resources from which these new Bishops were to be created; and therefore he was at a loss to understand on what reasonable ground the Bill could be objected to. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) said there was no evidence that a general desire had been expressed for the passing of this Bill, but he destroyed his own premises, for he proceeded to say that if the Bill were passed, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would be unable to resist the applications which would be made by persons in all parts of the country for the appointment of additional Bishops. There was, he thought, a very strong feeling in favour of that measure on the part of intelligent, thoughtful, and devoted men in the Church, whose views and wishes were entitled to the consideration of the House. It was unreasonable to expect a great number of Petitions from the public at large on such a subject. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) wound up his attack upon the Church by saying he was a staunch member of it. He thanked him for that declaration, because it could hardly have been guessed from the tenour of his speech. For himself, he was not surprised or concerned that Dissent had taken hold of the people in Wales, where the Church had laboured under great disadvantage from the ignorance of many of the clergy of the native language, and also from much neglect on the part of both clergymen and laymen; because he would infinitely sooner see energetic, conscientious, and zealous Dissenters doing a good work in Wales than see the people utterly neglected, as they would otherwise have been. The apostles of religious equality said a Church could not be national unless it was co-extensive with the nation; but such a Church could never exist in a country like this, where religious freedom prevailed. He was therefore not concerned to maintain that the Established Church contained the whole of the people. All he said was that it was recognized by the State; that three-fourths of the nation adhered to it; that its religion was the religion of the Sovereign and of the State, and must remain so unless they entirely destroyed the Constitution of this country. Religious liberty was one thing, and it was fully enjoyed in this Kingdom. Religious equality was another thing, and it amounted to nothing else but a Republic. They could not maintain a Monarch on the Throne who had not a religion, and they could not find any religion for the Monarch which the people of England would accept but the one that was now connected with the State. He demurred, in the interests of liberty itself, to the attempt to force on changes in the Constitution which would utterly destroy the liberty they now enjoyed. The difficulty as to claims for compensation mentioned by the hon. Member for Swansea was removed by the circumstance that under this Bill no money would be taken from any public funds, while the necessary means would be provided by the personal liberality of Churchmen. If the Bishops should, at any future time, be deprived of their positions, they could be paid off with the principal of the monies, the interest of which would be amply sufficient to provide for them during their tenure of office. They would not receive £5,000 a-year, and would live quietly and usefully in their dioceses. He saw an advantage in having a class of Bishops who, as would be the case under that Bill, would be free from the enervating effect of political bias in their original selection, and who, if they subsequently found their way to the House of Lords, would reach it by their own merits. The Bill was one which the interests of the country demanded, and he should therefore give it his support.

MR. E. J. REED said, he would oppose that measure on the ground that it had been avowed by one of its supporters in the House that it aimed at withdrawing in part the National Church from the control of the National Legislature, and that, too, in a manner affecting the constitution of the other House of Parliament. This was certainly not a moment for withdrawing from the control of Parliament and handing over to the Church itself the power of not only electing Bishops, but of placing them on the high road to the other branch of the Legislature. Though many of the clergy were the friends of enlightenment and freedom, the Church was nevertheless doing its best to de-Protestantize the country and spread a vicious superstition through the land; and he thought it was a most lamentable thing that the constitution of a Church which was allied to the State should not place the clergy under more restraint, and prevent them from holding out inducements to their flocks to put their confidence in regard to matters of faith and religion upon forms and ceremonies which were spurned and turned out of the Church long ago, in what they might fairly call the dark ages.

MR. HENLEY said, that no one either in that House or out of it was more sensible than he was how necessary it was that there should be some increase in the Episcopate, owing to the great increase in the population of the country; but while he admitted that in its fullest sense, he was also bound to say that he thought the means or machinery introduced by his hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope) to supply that want was not only not well suited to the purpose, but also in many particulars likely to prove mischievous. For that reason he was unable to support the Bill. A question of that importance, moreover, ought to be taken in hand by the Government. If they thought upon consideration that the want could not be met by an individual Bill here and there, and that it required a larger measure, then the attention of the Government ought to be given to a general scheme, by which the size and the population of the new Diocese should be well considered, in order that the matter should not be cast, as that Bill would cast it, upon a sort of "happy-go-lucky" system, without any principle to guide the Ecclesiastical Commissioners either as to the extent of the Dioceses or as to any other point, except that they were to exercise a discretion on the money to be given. No man had a greater respect than he for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but he did not think it was fair to throw on them that with respect to which Parliament was more competent to form an opinion. That was another reason why the Bill was unsuitable. Again, apart from the spiritual view of the question, there was the constitutional question of the number of Bishops who were to have seats in the House of Lords. As to that, he thought it would not be unwise to assume that it was not likely the number would be increased; and then the question arose, How was that number to be kept up? Then, again, it was most important that an opinion should be formed beforehand of the extent of the probable increase of the Episcopate which they thought right; because if there was only a moderate increase, the system proposed by the Bill might possibly work without much inconvenience. But if there was to be a large increase—say of ten or a dozen, which probably his hon. Friend might not think very large—then the system of succeeding to the seats in the House of Lords would, in his opinion, be certain to lead to this conclusion—that the whole body of the Bishops would be excluded from the House of Lords. Because, what would be the position of things? They would have them coming one after another at that time of life when men were less able, if able at all, to perform those duties which hitherto they had performed. Therefore, the work of the Dioceses would not only not be so well performed, but in what position would a man be, going quite at what might be called the evening of life into the House of Lords, to take a part in the deliberation of that great Assembly, and, what was more than taking a part, that he should have established such a place there as to lead that House to value his opinions on the matters brought before it? Those were some of the reasons which prevented him from voting with his hon. Friend. He thought nothing could be so mischievous as to have a machinery created by which a large number of Bishops in a number of years—he was unable to calculate either the number of years or the length of the lives before they would reach the House of Lords—would evidently enter that Assembly as worn-out men. A good deal had been said about the authority on which that Bill came down last year from the other House. He was as well disposed as any man to yield, and he always did, to such authority. But, unfortunately, some 30 years ago another Bill came down from the same place with some very curious recommendations. That Bill proposed not only that one Bishop should do the work of two, if paid for it, but also that one Archbishop should do the work of two Provinces and two Dioceses—one in York and the other in Canterbury; but to that he was opposed; and, in fact, neither he nor those with whom he had acted at the time could swallow it; and he was one of four, the present Postmaster General being another, who were in a minority on a division on the Bill. He believed it was law now; at any rate, he had never heard of its being repealed. It was therefore important that they should consider these questions on their own merits, and not allow themselves to be carried away by the authority on which they were recommended. These were shortly the reasons which induced him to support the Amendment. He earnestly hoped the Government would give their best attention to the subject; and, if they thought it necessary, lay down some general proposition with respect to the number and size of the Dioceses proposed to be formed. This was a matter on which he held a very decided opinion, and he felt bound to give his vote against the Bill.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN remarked that if the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hubbard), that Bishops were far more useful in their dioceses than in the House of Lords represented generally the views of the Church of England, it would go far to avert that opposition which many hon. Members on that side of the House entertained for this Bill. They would gladly give the Church of England as many Bishops as she liked, if for each one given one of those now sitting in the House of Lords would be relegated to his own Diocese. The right hon. Gentleman was not correct in saying that this was a Bill to enable the Church to govern herself. That might be true if the Bill gave power to Convocation—particularly to a remodelled Convocation, though he would not himself be prepared to assent to such a proposal. But he had never before heard that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—one of whom was appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and two by the Crown—were synonymous with the Church. The real question for consideration was, however, whether the Bill was likely to strengthen the Church in her relation to the nation. If they considered the Church as a national Church, what was more clear than that, if new Bishoprics were wanted, they should be proposed upon the responsibility of the Government, and that the question should be submitted by them to both Houses of Parliament. To delegate the power of creating new Sees to any other body would to that extent weaken the status of the Church of England, which as a national Church, had better deal directly with the national legislation; and, as a friend of the Church and one who was not in favour of disestablishment, he held that this Bill tended directly towards disestablishment. In his opinion, the fairest and wisest course to take was to support the Previous Question.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE observed, that there was a general concurrence of opinion in the House as to the necessity of doing something to meet the spiritual wants of the population which was growing up in different parts of the country. Any one who reflected on the state of the Diocese of Exeter could not fail to see that there, for instance, some additional Episcopal superintendence was required, and the same want was experienced in other places. But, while the necessity of increasing the Episcopate was obvious, the Bill did not appear to him to be one that Parliament could accept. A measure which propounded loosely and vaguely that they should leave the matter to private and voluntary exertion, without any information as to what were the parts of the country which required an increase of the Episcopate, could not be accepted; and it would be idle, and worse than idle, to leave it to the discretion of zealous friends of the Church to increase the Episcopate where it might not be desirable, while other parts of the country where it was desirable were left neglected. The details of the Bill altogether were so objectionable that, to have any chance of passing at all, it would have to be completely remodelled. He entertained a very strong opinion that those who desired to have an established religion in this country must feel that any changes or additions which were made to that Establishment, or any alterations that were propounded in the law with reference to it, ought to come before Parliament with the joint concurrence of the Episcopal Bench and the Government. Now, that unanimity in the present case did not exist. The measure was not one which the Government had thought it right to support, nor had it been sent down to that House by the Episcopal Bench. Believing that it could not be remodelled without changing the whole framework of the measure, he hoped that the Government would tell the House, whether they could see their way to increasing the Episcopate, and then they might obtain a measure which would be very beneficial to the country. He would support the second reading of the Bill merely as an expression of his opinion that some increase of the Episcopate ought to be made; but it must be on the understanding that it should not be further proceeded with until the Government took the subject in hand.

MR. CUBITT said, he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot). The necessity for an increase of the Episcopate, urgent as it was, would have been more felt if it had not been for the accident of many retired Bishops from the colonies being in England and the restoration by the late Government of the order of suffragans. There were no public funds available for new Bishoprics, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would be prevented this year, as they were last, from accepting more than one-third of the benefactions offered them because they had not sufficient funds to meet them. It was to private, and not to public, funds, therefore, that they must look for provision for an increased Episcopate. As an Ecclesiastical Commissioner, and speaking for himself, he thought the duties sought to be imposed upon that body by this Bill were duties which they would find it very difficult to discharge, even if they were not altogether beyond their province. In these days of generosity it was possible that some impulsive and generous person might offer a large sum to found a Bishopric in one large and populous parish of London; and the Commissioners would be placed in the dilemma of either having to refuse a large benefaction made to the Church, or to prepare a scheme which would not be at all likely to enhance the opinion entertained by Parliament of their wisdom, and which would have no chance of passing. The question of the increase of the Episcopate had passed out of private hands into that of the Government. Last year they passed a Bill for the Bishopric of St. Albans, and it was said that efforts were being made with their sanction to obtain the residue of the funds needed for the establishment of a Bishopric for Cornwall. He thought the matter might well be left in their hands; and he protested against the duties which the Bill proposed being thrown upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, he hoped that the Memorial lately presented to the Government in favour of the increase of the Episcopate would have due weight. If the Bill were pressed to a second reading he should support it, because he wished to affirm the principle that it was undesirable to have piecemeal legislation on this subject. Out of 450 rural deaneries, representing some 10,000 parishes, from which communications had been received on the subject, 441 were in favour of an increase, the only doubt entertained being as to the raising of funds, and the propriety of increasing the number of Bishops in the House of Lords. The laity, he believed, were generally in favour of an extension of the Episcopate in districts where there had been a large increase of population. The greatest benefits had resulted from the division of the diocese of Chester, Episcopal supervision had become a reality and not a name. At the present moment there was still a population of 1,500,000 under the Bishop of Chester, and a very strong opinion prevailed in favour of the appointment of a new Bishop for Liverpool. He quite agreed that, for the first year, a Bishop should not be called upon to attend to his duties in Parliament; and he was therefore in favour of Bishops taking their seats in the House of Lords by rotation. The Government had admitted the principle of an increase of the Episcopate by their Bill of last year, and he therefore thought that the time had come for the Government to deal with this question in a comprehensive measure.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS congratulated the House upon the calm and temperate character of the discussion, and upon the evident desire which had been shown on all sides to deal with the matter dispassionately, fairly, and in a spirit of entire justice to the Church of England. No one who had had to deal with the large masses of our population, which had increased so rapidly during the last few years, especially in the manufacturing districts, could possibly have witnessed that increase without having come to the conclusion that if a Bishop of the Church of England was to attempt to do his work with anything like satisfaction he must have assistance, otherwise he could not possibly do it. He (Mr. Cross) knew nothing so absolutely depressing to a man placed in a position of high authority, with the most responsible of all duties and with the most earnest desire to fulfil his work, as to feel that however much he exerted himself, whatever self-sacrifice he incurred, it was impossible for him to fulfil the duties which were incumbent upon him. If this were so, it was clear that there must be some relief granted. He was sure the House would agree with him when he said that there was the most earnest desire on the part of the Bench of Bishops to do their duty in their dioceses; but what could they do if circumstances were too strong for them? Let them take the case of the diocese of Chester, which had been divided. What could the Bishop of Chester, by even more than human strength, do if he had, in addition to all the duties which at present devolved upon him, the spiritual charge of the vast diocese of Manchester? Why, that diocese alone had increased to such an extent within a few years as to overstrain the powers of one of the most earnest, zealous, and efficient Bishops on the Bench. If a man in full health and strength, with only that portion of a diocese under his control, was rendered absolutely unable to perform his duties, what would have been the case if the burden had been left upon the Bishop of Chester? Owing to the vast increase of wealth and population in this country large towns, such as Middlesbrough and Barrow-in-Furness, sprang up in the course of 10 or 12 years where previously there had been but a scanty population. It was quite clear, therefore, that if the work was to be done there must be, from time to time, some revision of the number of those who had to do it, and of the extent of the work which each had to do. His hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope) must have been aware from the action already taken by Her Majesty's Government, of their opinion that the necessity existed for some steps being taken to remove this evil. They had passed into law an Act for the episcopal supervision of one of the most populous dioceses in this country. He did not believe there was any difference of opinion as to the point of which he had already spoken; but the question of the means by which that view was to be carried out was a totally different matter, and he hoped his hon. Friend who had charge of this Bill would tell the House that it was not his intention to make any division of opinion apparent where no such division really existed. His right hon. Friend the senior Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Spencer Walpole) had stated that, in his opinion, this was a bad measure. No one who had read the Bill could, in his (Mr. Cross's) opinion, come to any other conclusion. He considered his right hon. Friend's objections to the provisions of the Bill to be of vital importance. Even the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray), who supported the Bill, was obliged to say that in voting for the second reading he was only voting for the Preamble, and that almost all its provisions would have to be changed. For his own part, he thought it would never do to bestow upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—for whom he had the highest respect—a sort of roving Commission to make Bishoprics at their discretion. There was, no doubt, a provision in the Bill that the schemes of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should be laid before Parliament, as a safeguard against the adoption of any ill-judged proposal; but that would involve an evil which it was desirable to avoid—namely, the perpetual discussion of Church questions in that House, for every scheme proposed by the Commissioners would, no doubt, excite controversy. At the same time, the Commissioners were invested with very questionable powers, the 11th clause, for instance, providing that they might attach to any new Bishopric a portion of the income of the Bishop whose diocese had been diminished. Thus the Commissioners were to be intrusted with the disposal of money which was already applied by Parliament to a particular purpose. Surely that was not a wise provision. However, he would not discuss further the details of the Bill, but proceed briefly to state what the Government were prepared to do in reference to the Episcopate. The diocese of Exeter undoubtedly called for some action being taken. Well, a proposition was made to him some months ago for the formation of a diocese of Cornwall. Funds to the amount of £1,200 a-year were placed at his disposal, on the condition that the Bishopric should be founded during the lifetime of the donor. That generous offer was met in the most liberal spirit by the Bishop of Exeter, who was willing to give up £800 a-year of the income of his diocese to be added to the £1,200 offered. He thought that a very generous proposition. As soon as sufficient additional funds were provided to furnish a proper income for the new Bishop, a scheme for the establishment of a Bishopric of Cornwall would, no doubt, be prepared. Up to the present moment, unfortunately, the necessary funds had not been forthcoming; but he hoped they would be, and in that case he would strongly recommend the adoption of a measure for effecting the object in view. He felt that it was not, perhaps, the wisest course to bring forward a separate Bill for each separate diocese, and he was not prepared to say, therefore, on behalf of the Government, that he should not be willing to consider a well-prepared scheme for a limited number of new dioceses. He thought, however, with his right hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Spencer Walpole), that in selecting these special dioceses, in fixing their limits, and in dealing with the intricate questions which would be raised, Her Majesty's Government, in concurrence with the Bench of Bishops, had a much better opportunity of knowing, and were much more likely to come to a wise conclusion, than the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and he thought a matter of this gravity, touching so deeply the interests of the Church and the State, should be brought forward on the responsibility of the Government. He might also state that negotiations had been, he would not say entered into, but proposed for the formation of other dioceses in other parts of the country; but no proposition had come before him in such a form as would at the present moment justify him in laying it before the consideration of the Government. He was, however, perfectly prepared when any such propositions were made to lay them before the Government. Instead of dealing with cases individually, he should prefer to lay on the Table of the House a scheme for a limited number of Bishoprics, so that the work of the Bishops might be properly divided, at all events, until the changes in the population of the country rendered some re-adjustment necessary. He hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope) would not press for a division. There was no difference of opinion amongst his Friends and amongst a great number of Members on the opposite side of the House as to the necessity for some increase in the Episcopate. There was no difference in any portion of the House on the question that if the work was to be done there ought to be men to do it; and he trusted his hon. Friend would not put them in the false position of being apparently divided amongst themselves when practically there was no division of opinion.

MR. HALL said, that the course of the debate had so altered the position in which he stood with respect to the measure, that with the view of giving further time for consideration, he would move that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. GRANTHAM seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Hall.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he had only to state, in reply to the friendly criticisms upon his Bill, that he had no option as to its form. He introduced it as it had come from "another place" without a division, as the Episcopate had sanctioned it, as the ministry had also virtually approved it, and in particular as the Archbishop of Canterbury had very warmly commended it, so the shafts of his right hon. Colleague and of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) struck a far higher quarry than himself. Upon the general question, he was sorry that the Government had not made up their minds nine months earlier. This would have saved a great deal of trouble. He did not think the just expectations of the country would be satisfied by little Bills dropping in from time to time, enacting a Bishopric here and a Bishopric there. However, he accepted the statement of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary as a general promise that the Government would take in hand the extension of the Episcopate in a systematic way, and by some measure providing for the creation of a plurality of Sees. Accordingly, he most willingly accepted the Motion for the adjournment, hoping that in the meantime Her Majesty's Government would be able to state something more definite than what they had heard that day.

Mr. DODSON said, he had not heard any reason why the debate should be adjourned. There was a general opinion that this measure could not be adopted, and it was better that it should be disposed of at once. The best course, he thought, was that the Bill should be withdrawn.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT said, that the reason for adjourning the debate was this—the Bill had commanded a great deal of support, and the Government had, through the Home Secretary, made an important announcement, which was a great encouragement to the supporters of the measure. If the Bill were withdrawn, it would seem as if it had received a blow, whereas, in fact, the discussion had shown that it was strongly supported; and further, no inconvenience could arise from an adjournment of the debate, for the subject could then be more fairly and adequately discussed.

Mr. DISRAELI: I hope the House will assent to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Hall). We understand that it is the wish of the Mover of the Bill; and as the Mover of the Bill has placed his interpretation on that Motion—namely, that the debate is adjourned to an indefinite day—I trust that after the discussion which has passed, the House, as an act of courtesy to my hon. Friend, will agree to the Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes 174; Noes 90: Majority 84.

VALUATION OF PROPERTY (METROPOLIS) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, explained that the object of the measure was to carry still further the principle of valuation in the direction of a general system by having the house tax and the income tax calculated on the net rateable value of property, and not on the gross value or rent paid by the tenant. They found by looking at the Act that, whereas all local rates of whatever kind were assessed upon a measure of value laid down in the net rateable value, yet Imperial taxes were levied on the gross value. For example, the gross rental of the metropolis was £24,000,000, and the net rental £20,000,000; and while the local taxation was levied on the £20,000,000 only, the Imperial taxes were raised from the £24,000,000, which was, he conceived, an unjust anomaly. That was to say, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer taxed the £4,000,000 which were expended in repairing and keeping up the property. Even this did not represent the full extent of the evil which was suffered. Suppose a man had £2,400 a-year gross, and £2,000 net rental, and that there were incumbrances to the extent of £1,600 a-year, the owner, in such a state of things, would be taxed upon £800 a-year, whilst he would only receive £400 a-year. He thought it was a gross injustice, and one that demanded a remedy; and it might fairly be asked why was there this difference? He thought the difference was easily explicable. The income tax was introduced merely for a temporary purpose, and it was, therefore, easily understood why it was inexpedient to disturb one year the basis of a tax which next year might be wholly abolished. Under the present system, they had the frightful anomaly that the individual owner of real property paid a double income tax, and the capitalist was relieved. With the slight amendment of the Metropolitan Act which he proposed, he thought that Act would be a model and a specimen of the system which he hoped to find prevailing throughout the whole country. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH said, there could be no possible objection to the Bill being brought in; but it must be understood that the Government was not pledged to it as regarded the limitations imposed, for he did not see how its operation could be confined to the metropolis alone.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Beresford Hope

Bill to amend the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. FORSYTH, and Mr. TWELLS.

HOMICIDE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law of homicide, said, it was founded on the recommendations contained in the Report of the Royal Commission of 1865, and was drafted in accordance with the statutes now in operation in America, which established first and second degrees of murder, for which specific punishments were awarded, and also for improving the law of infanticide. The hon. and learned Baronet concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law of Homicide, ordered to be brought in by Sir EARDLEY WILMOT and Mr. WHITWELL.

TOLL BRIDGES (RIVER THAMES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Alderman M'ARTHUR, Bill to provide for throwing open for the free use of the public the present Toll Bridges connecting the counties of Middlesex and Surrey across the River Thames, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Alderman M'ARTHUR, Sir JAMES CLARKE LAWRENCE, Mr. FORSYTH, Sir HENRY PEEK, Sir TREVOR LAWRENCE, and Sir CHARLES RUSSELL.

MERCANTILE MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE BILL.

On Motion of Captain PIM, Bill to provide for the organization of a Mercantile Marine Hospital Service and the Medical Examination of Seamen, ordered to be brought in by Captain PIM and Mr. WHEELHOUSE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 76.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 17th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—Earl Stanhope, after the death of his Father.

NEW PEER.

Henry Gerard Sturt, Esquire, having been created Baron Alington of Crichel in the county of Dorset—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

WEST COAST OF AFRICA—EXCHANGE OF TERRITORY.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARON rose to call attention to the negotiations with the French Government for certain territorial exchanges on the West Coast of Africa, and said:—My Lords, I shall have to ask your Lordships for unusual patience this evening, because I am suffering from a cold so severe that I feel I shall find some difficulty in making the short statement; but, at the same time, I am aware that there is at the present so much misunderstanding on the subject of the proposed transfer as to make it desirable that at the earliest possible moment I should make a few observations to Parliament in respect of it. My Lords, your Lordships will remember that at the close of last Session, when this question was mooted, I gave a distinct promise on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that no conclusive—no final—steps should be taken which could preclude Parliament from having an opportunity of expressing an opinion. My Lords, I do not now ask your Lordships to agree to any Resolution. I desire, so to say, to lay the matter—with regard to the few points raised in which I think there is some misunderstanding—before your Lordships, in order that you may have a general idea of what is proposed. It is extremely difficult for anyone to appreciate the facts, circumstances, and necessities of the case unless he is familiar with the geography of the regions in question. Your Lordships will recollect we have three settlements on the Gold Coast. Gambia, which is the northernmost; Sierra Leone, which is separated from it by a long interval; and the newly-consolidated settlement of the Gold Coast and Lagos. The Gambia settlement, going back from the coast, is in proximity to the French colony of Senegal, and may be described as the outlying part of the national estate. I do not propose to detain your Lordships by going into all that occurred at the outset of the negotiations with France with respect to these territories. Suffice it to say that since 1866 these negotiations have been continuous. With the exception of an interval during the Franco-German War, they have been almost continuous from year to year. In 1866 proposals were made by the French Government to Lord Clarendon.

In 1867 they were renewed; and in 1868 the French Colony of Senegal made certain advances of territory abutting on Sierra Leone, which led to apprehensions of difficulty to our Colony. In 1869 and 1870 the negotiations were still continued; and the only point to which I need direct your Lordships' attention is that up to that time what this country proposed to do was to extinguish the rights which the French had in the neighbourhood of Sierra Leone. But a very much more favourable arrangement has since been proposed for our acceptance. As I have stated, the Franco-German War caused an interruption in the negotiations, and though they came before us from time to time nothing tangible was proposed till 1874. By that time circumstances as regards our possessions had very much altered:—the Gold Coast Colonies had been consolidated, and thus what might have been desirable had become almost a necessity, looking at it in the way of revenue. The substance of the proposals made by the French Government to me may be briefly stated as follows:—First, that the French should abandon all their rights and establishments in and around the territory of Sierra Leone; secondly, that they should abandon their posts of Assinie and Grand Bassam, and all their posts further down the Coast on the other side; thirdly, that they should abandon all territory claimed by them between the Gold Coast and Lagos; and fourthly, that they should abandon any pretensions or rights they may have east of Lagos to their own settlement of the Gaboon. Your Lordships will see that by this arrangement not only all French claims between Sierra Leone and the easternmost extremity of Lagos would be swept away, but we should acquire exclusive rights at the mouths of the Niger if we like to use them. When I say that the French surrender these rights and pretensions, it does not follow that we acquire fresh territory. So far from increasing our responsibilities in these quarters, I am prepared to contend that by such an arrangement as that proposed we should be diminishing them; because we should be making the territory that belongs to us more compact and more consolidated, and, therefore, more manageable for political and fiscal purposes. What I think the transfer would do is this: it would remove all French rights, claims, and pretensions in the places I have named, and thereby prevent the conflict of authority which now exists, and which is so extremely injurious to our interests. There has been so much misunderstanding, and I may say so much misrepresentation, with regard to this exchange, that I hope your Lordships will forgive me if I feel it necessary to go into these matters. My desire is to show that many of the objections I have heard do not really go to the point, and that more of them are founded on a total misapprehension of the facts. It has been said that an exchange of this kind involves a dismemberment of Imperial rights. I am at a loss to see how that can be the case in such an arrangement as this. If the policy hitherto pursued by Her Majesty's Government and if what we have said from time to time on subjects of this kind does not justify them against a charge of wishing to dismember Imperial rights, nothing that I can urge will. Then I am told that this is one of our oldest Colonies. But that is not the fact—it is not an old Colony, for the settled institution of the Gambia Colony only dates from 1821, and consequently it is not more than about half a century old. It is true that so far back as 1588 the original charter was given to merchants to trade on the Coast; but for many generations afterwards there was no settlement. There were disputed claims. One part of the Coast was held by the French and the other by ourselves, and it was only by the Treaty of Versailles in 1783 that the French resigned all their rights, and only by the Peace of 1814 that what they so resigned was secured to us. It was still later, not until 1816, that a small settlement was found on the Gambia, and a few years afterwards, in consequence of an attack by certain of the Native tribes, a detachment of a West India Regiment was sent there. In 1821 settled institutions were established there. What we now propose is called by some a "cession." I object to the word—it is not a "cession," but an "exchange;" and just as it is reasonable for the owner of a private estate to round off and consolidate his possessions, so it is equally reasonable to do the same for the public estate, and to make such arrangements as will enable us to consolidate a territory which at present, owing to its want of consolidation, is exposed to great difficulty as to its administration, political and fiscal. But then it is urged that the noble Earl who preceded me at the Colonial Office (the Earl of Kimberley) in 1870 or 1871 gave a pledge that this question of transfer was then abandoned, never to be opened again. If that allegation was true, I should attach great weight to the objection based upon it. But the fact really is that my noble Friend never made any statement of the kind. I should have been surprised if, with his caution, he had done so. But what is the fact? In 1870 Lord Kimberley informs Sir Arthur Kennedy that

"though the intended transfer was postponed, Her Majesty's Government wish him to examine into the feelings of residents, especially Natives, and the obstacles which may present themselves to the transfer when occasion for it shall occur, and to take any steps which appear to him prudent to remove those obstacles."

That is not the language of a Minister giving an assurance that the question would never be stirred again. Again, in 1870, in reply to certain merchants, the noble Earl says—

"Her Majesty's Government state that, owing to the war, the negotiations for cession are suspended for the present."

And in August, the same year, our Ambassador at Paris informed the French Government

"that the negotiations could not be continued during the war, but that Her Majesty's Government reserve to themselves liberty to consider before renewing them the objections which have been raised to the transfer."

It is perfectly clear from this that, whatever course might have been ultimately adopted by the late Government, they had most carefully and jealously guarded themselves against any such pledge as that which they were alleged to have given. If this had not been the case, having regard to what the French call the solidarité which ought to exist between successive Governments, I should have paused before renewing the negotiations for the transfer. Another objection urged against the transfer is that there is an unanimous objection to it on the part of the Colonists. I take it upon myself to say that I have evidence that so far from there being a unanimous, there is scarcely a fractional objection to it, and, forming my own opinion from Papers in the Colonial Office, I have no doubt that the Colony is at the utmost indifferent to the whole transaction. If I for a moment supposed that there was any validity in this objection I would not be the one to make this proposition. I have a horror of trafficking in populations. I think such transactions are most foul, and can be adopted only in furtherance of the most base policy. To my mind nothing can be more reprehensible than to tamper with the feelings of populations in such a manner. But what is the state of facts as to the population of Gambia? That population consists mainly of Natives, and of a comparatively insignificant number of Europeans. The Native population is stated to be 14,000. What is the European? In the year 1851 it was 191. Twenty years afterwards it had dwindled down to 50; in 1872 it had diminished to 30; and in 1874 it had fallen to 20; and perhaps it may be below that number at present. Such is the population of Gambia. Now, let us see what the representation made by that population amounts to. During the time the negotiations were in progress under my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) a Petition was sent to him against the transfer signed by 502 persons; and in the course of last year there was forwarded to me a Petition with a similar prayer signed by 152 persons only. But I am bound to inform your Lordships that as regards the latter Petition the Governor states that of the 152 petitioners many were boys; others were what he describes as "men of straw;" and he adds that in numerous instances it was obvious that the signatures were written by the same hand. I do not think your Lordships will attach much importance to such a Petition as that. When it is urged that there is a strong and almost unanimous feeling on the part of the population against the transfer, words should be more carefully measured, and facts more strictly tested. Within the last few days I have been told by some gentlemen who take a great interest in the question that Gambia is very valuable to this country. Now I should not think it right to sacrifice a Colony simply because it did not pay its own expenses; but it is only right that your Lordships should be put in possession of the facts on this financial point. What is the real state of the case? It can be told in a very few words. Gambia has but few natural products. My noble Friend on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) once indulged in the hope that cotton might be grown there; but that dream has passed away. The cotton cultivation of Gambia was proved to be visionary. On the other hand, English trade, while I would not say it has absolutely and positively diminished, has been overshadowed by the French trade. It is not too much to say that the trade there has passed, or is passing, from English traders into the hands of French colonists. During the last seven years, with the exception of 1871, the revenue of Gambia has been in deficit. From 1821 to 1871 there had been Parliamentary grants in aid—sometimes large and sometimes small; but since 1871 no such Vote has been taken, and the consequence has been that there has been an increase of the debt, which from £75 has risen to £4,890. In addition to that, none of those works which are the life-blood of such a colony can be prosecuted in Gambia. It has been repeatedly pointed out that roads which are necessary for trade and for the defence of the country remain unmade. Mail steamers do at present touch at the Colony; but why? Because they are subsidized by the Treasury, which spends £1,200 a-year on them. The Colony can contribute nothing to the service; and when it has been found necessary to employ a detachment of troops in the Colony, the Imperial Government has been obliged to bear the expense. But it has been said that Gambia will ultimately have the trade of Central Africa. If that prediction is well-founded it is strange that it has been so long unverified. There are as yet no signs of that trade. There is another argument which has struck me as being the strangest one of all. It is alleged that Gambia has a healthy climate. Now, my Lords, whatever the other merits of Gambia may be, I never expected to hear that statement, and I heard it with astonishment. The climate along that West Coast differs in degrees, but it is in degrees of badness. The only question is which part has the worst. Nothing gives me so much pain as the receipt of the accounts which reach the Colonial Office of the mortality and sickness of the officers serving along that Coast. Last week I heard of the death of four, who within a very short time had been swept away by the remorseless fevers of that country. I admit that the Gold Coast may be worse than Gambia; but I say that at best Gambia is only one degree better. Though there may not be at the latter place the chronic and persistent illness there is at the former, still Gambia is subject to epidemics which sweep over it from time to time. Within the last 10 years there have been three of those epidemics. In 1866 yellow fever raged there; in 1869 cholera; and in 1872 yellow fever again. "In the rains the Europeans die, and in the cold the Africans." This was what was said by the Administrator in 1866. It is urged that the River Gambia is an important river. I admit it is a fine river, but its value is more than doubtful. It is not suited for ships of large burden; and my noble Friend opposite, who was at the head of the Foreign Office in 1870 (Earl Granville), said he could not conceive what the value of the Gambia could be, unless it were for the purpose of concealing sailors who might run away and wish to hide themselves in time of war. No doubt, it did render important service in former times; but those days are past, and the necessity for us to have that river no longer exists. As to its use as a coaling station, the Admiralty established a small coaling station on the Gambia which proved to be of so little value that after the experience of a few years it was abandoned. Again, we are told that the tribes in the neighbourhood of the settlement are amicable. I observe that if at any time the Colonial Office proposes to do anything which is regarded as rash towards a colony, they are reminded immediately of the amiability of the surrounding tribes; and I believe there never was less foundation for the assertion than there is in this instance. For what is the real state of the case? We have on our frontiers a large tribe of Mahomedan fanatics, who have gradually descended from the interior to the sea coast, sweeping all before them. They are eminently warlike and averse to order; and so far from having any reason to suppose they are amicably disposed towards us, we have very good grounds for believing that they are quite the reverse. Within the last two years since I have been in the Colonial Office we have been on the eve of a war with them. And what has been the previous history of their relations towards us? In 1853 the Colony was involved in a war with them, from which it was extricated by requesting the assistance of the French Colony at Senegal. In 1855 the Colony was again at war with them; in 1861 the same state of things arose, and again the Colony had French help against the Mahomedans; and again, in 1866, a war with them broke out which lasted two years. It is, I think, impossible, with those facts before one, to say that the tribes in the neighbourhood of Gambia are of a pacific or amicable character. I hope, my Lords, that in this brief outline I have shown that there is no foundation for the objections to which I have just referred. But it may be said—"Granted that the Colony is unhealthy; granted that it does not pay its way; granted that it is exposed to the attacks of warlike tribes in its immediate neighbourhood, and yet none of these circumstances affords a sufficient justification for a transfer." Even if that were so it would not affect my proposition. I put forward what is to be gained by our West African Settlements, looking at them as a whole—looking at the whole rather than at a part. But then it is said—"Why not acquire the French settlements by purchase?" I admit that if we could accomplish what we require by purchase, a proposition to do it in that way would be well worthy the consideration of Parliament. If it could be gained in any other way I should not have advised the exchange of Gambia. But that is the price asked. The French desire Gambia, and we desire the French Settlements. It is for Parliament to consider whether the price asked is equivalent to what we are to give, or is it an excessive price. Now, what is our position on the West Coast? It is simply this—We hold a line of coast; at various intervals along that line are various French settlements, through which goods of all kinds are smuggled into the interior, and compete on manifestly unfair terms with our imports. We, at present, raise our revenue in these parts by customs duties; but it is impossible that we can secure our revenues while this state of things exists, and when we know that other parties can undersell us in every way it is necessary that something should be done. Well, not to go into detail, it has been estimated that if the transfer can be effected the revenue of Sierra Leone will be enormously increased, and that the revenue of the Gold Coast, which is now £70,000 a-year, can be increased to £170,000—some carry the estimate as high as £200,000. I shall not pronounce an opinion as to whether that is excessive; but there is good reason to believe that the revenue of the Gold Coast may be doubled. Now, what is meant by revenue? Revenue on the Gold Coast means everything. It means good government; it means the health of the English officers who are employed there; it means the civilization of the Natives on the Coast; and it means security against attack. I say we are not in a position of security on the Gold Coast, and to put us in that position increased expenditure is necessary. There are but two ways in which revenue for such a Colony may be obtained. On the one hand, it can be found from within; and I believe the resources of the Gold Coast with Lagos are such as to secure for us a revenue which will enable us to secure the great objects to which I have just adverted. On the other hand, if you do not get a revenue from within, there is one other source from which it can be had, and that is a Parliamentary Vote in aid. My noble Friend who is sitting on the cross-benches (Earl Grey), in very able letters which he wrote 20 years ago, makes some very cogent observations. In one of these letters my noble Friend observes—

"But these objects could not be obtained without a large increase of expense, and Parliament has always shown what I consider a well-founded reluctance to increase its Votes for purposes of this description. It does not appear to me that the people of this country ought to be called upon to pay for the cost of extensive schemes of internal improvement in Africa."

He then goes on to say—

"For these reasons I considered myself bound to adhere to the rule of not proposing to my Colleagues that Parliament should be asked to increase the usual grants for the civil establishments on the West Coast of Africa; and though I was most anxious for the adoption of measures of improvement which could not be accomplished without considerable expense, I thought it right in this part of the African Continent, as well as in Natal, to proceed with these measures only as their cost could be provided for by means of local resources."

Well, my Lords, that is the alternative Parliament has before it? Parliament deliberately decided to retain the Gold Coast Colony. It did so undoubtedly in the belief that good government could be established in that Colony, and for the improvement and the civilization of the Native races. In a great part the intentions of Parliament have been carried out; but owing to climate and other causes this has been at a much greater expenditure than would otherwise have been called for. If the Customs duties can be made available by such protection against smuggling as this transfer would secure to us, then I believe the revenue will be sufficient to meet all the requirements. If not, then I see no alternative other than that Parliament should step in. But, my Lords, there is another point in connection with this matter which ought not to be concealed from your Lordships. It is not merely ordinary goods and other articles of commerce which are imported through the French settlements, but large importations of ammunition and of most dangerous weapons of war are effected through them. This is no fanciful danger. During the Ashantee War we had evidence that immediately before it importations had been carried on which went far to enable the Ashantees to maintain that war; and it was only a short time since I received a despatch from the Resident at Coomassie in which he stated that he had seen a review of Ashantee troops on their return from some proceedings in which they had been engaged, and not only had they an abundant supply of arms of all sizes, but one detachment had been drilled in the use of the breech-loader, and apparently had become familiar with the method of handling it. During the Ashantee War in which we were engaged their weapons were bad, and, consequently, the loss of life was small:—there can be no doubt that had they been then supplied with arms of precision the loss of life on our side would have been very much larger. My Lords, to sum up what seem to me to be the arguments in favour of the proposed transfer. The exchange now proposed is, in my opinion, more favourable to this country than any previously offered; secondly, as it is more favourable, so it is more important at this moment, because there is now a greater necessity than ever for some such arrangement. It may be said, perhaps, that in urging such considerations I have stated the case too strongly, and that if the exchange was really so favourable to us, it would not be likely that the French would propose it. My Lords, from the nature of our institutions it is impossible to disguise facts in connection with such transactions as this. They must be stated for what they are worth, and it must be left to the good sense of Parliament and of the English people to deal with them. But what I have said as to the advantages to us is equally applicable to the French. They, in respect of their settlement at Senegal, are situated as we are in respect of ours on the Gold Coast. They labour under the same difficulties that we do, and it is as important to them to consolidate their possessions as it is to us to consolidate ours. At the same time, in a matter of this kind, I have no wish to force the proposition on Parliament. It is, no doubt, a question of exchange, or of giving up, in some form or other, territory which we now possess. When that is the case, I hold that the Government cannot proceed with too much caution to ascertain that it is in unison with the feelings of Parliament on the subject. I wish Parliament to understand the proposal, to sift and analyze it, and to subject it to any test that may be thought fit. I believe that the more the question is tested and analyzed, the more it will be shown that these negotiations on which successive Governments have been more or less engaged are now more important than ever. As I have before put it, there are only two alternatives if Parliament wishes to retain the Colony of the Gold Coast and to promote the civilization of the Natives, and to adopt the best measures possible for the safety and the health of the English officers employed there. You must either find means to increase the revenues in the Colony itself, or the Imperial Parliament must vote a grant in aid. I believe that if Parliament gives its approval to this transfer it will do well. I submit it to your Lordships for consideration, thanking you for the patience with which you have listened to an imperfect statement of a measure which, if it cannot be called a large one, is certainly one of some importance, if we consider the interests which will be affected by the course which Parliament may decide on with respect to the proposition the details of which I have now laid before your Lordships.

The Earl of Carnarvon

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am extremely sorry to hear of the indisposition from which the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) is suffering, but I congratulate him on being able, notwithstanding that indisposition, to give your Lordships so clear a statement of his views as that to which we have just listened. I presume the noble Earl does not intend that the House should on this occasion enter upon a discussion of the proposed transfer; because, considering that the Papers on the subject were only delivered a few hours ago, it would hardly be reasonable to expect that noble Lords should be prepared for such a discussion. But as, in a certain sense, I have been appealed to, and as the Government with which I was connected had something to do with negotiations on this subject, perhaps the House will allow me to at once say a few words. They shall be few, for when I say I shall not be long I always adhere to that promise. I will first allude to what was done by the late Government. But before doing so I would observe that on the question of the connection of our Colonies with the mother country two sets of opinions are held which are not only extreme in themselves, but are entirely opposed the one set to the other. Some people hold that our Colonies are a loss rather than a gain to the mother country, and that it is an advantage to us to lose rather than to acquire colonial possessions. These persons maintain that our Colonial Empire may be surrendered without disadvantage. On the other hand, there are persons who contend that to hold our colonial possessions must be an advantage, and that the giving up of any of them must be a loss, because it is a diminution of our Colonial Empire. I am happy that the noble Earl opposite has adopted the course taken by previous Colonial Secretaries, and has not ranged himself with either of the parties who hold these extreme views. I am glad to think he considers that each case should be decided on its own particular merits. My noble Friend, in his statement to your Lordships, has laid stress on his view, that the scheme which he brought before us is not a "cession," but an "exchange." I am inclined to think it is a cession. He said that it is not a cession, because we get something in exchange; but I think that the transfer of a Colony may be a cession without that fact militating against the transaction:—because I am not prepared to hold that, if a colonial dependency is found to be a burden to us, and might be a benefit to some other nations, there are no circumstances under which we should be at liberty to part with such a dependency to that other country. Therefore, my Lords, I do not quarrel with the word cession. My Lords, as to my share in negotiations for a transfer, while I was at the Colonial Office, what happened was this:—It was represented to the Government here that the climate was so bad that no one could remain two years in those parts, except the unfortunate officials who were sent there by the Government; and that not only was our trade small, but the imports of the English houses were daily diminishing, while the French were increasing their trade and carrying it on in such a way as was sure to do injury to the English. It was further stated in the communications from the Colony that the Colony was a difficult one to manage in consequence of the character of the neighbouring tribes. That being the state of things, and there being no longer any advantages from the possession of the Colony in the way of suppressing a slave trade which no longer existed, I thought that the Government would be acting quite within the spirit of the recommendations of the Committee of the House of Commons in receiving proposals and entering on negotiations such as those spoken of by the noble Earl. I may say that when I left the Colonial Office the great difficulty that was felt was as to the feeling of the Natives, which we felt bound to consult. I am glad to hear that no such difficulty exists now. Thus matters stood and I left the Colonial Office absolutely unpledged to the French Government. My noble Friend beside me (the Earl of Kimberley) took up the business of the Colonial Office and we acted entirely in concert. The unfortunate Franco-German War broke out, and we were of opinion that that put an end necessarily to any negotiation in the matter. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) was full right in saying that my noble Friend did not give any pledge that the question would not be revived again. How could my noble Friend give any such pledge? Then the noble Earl said that there were advantages in the present arrangement over that which was contemplated by us. I certainly cannot give an opinion on that subject. It may be that there are advantages—it may be that there are disadvantages; but I am glad to hear that the noble Earl considers that there are advantages. It is incompetent in me to oppose the proposition of the noble Earl, but I own it appears to me rather an unusual course to make such a statement as that to which we have just listened. The usual course is for the Government to make up its mind as to the policy it will recommend, and then, by bringing forward a Bill or in some other manner, to elicit the opinion of Parliament in reference to it. The noble Earl, however, in laying the Papers on the Table, has, notwithstanding his indisposition, been good enough to make the explanation we have heard. What I rather gather is this, that the Government have not now quite made up their minds, although a short time ago they thought they had made up their minds, and that they think it better to ventilate the subject, and see how the cat jumps, leaving the ultimate result to the noble Duke and the Chief Justice. That, I believe, is what is behind; but, meanwhile, I thank the noble Earl for the interesting statement he has made.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he trusted the Government would not take further steps in this matter until Parliament had received more information than had been laid before them. The information they at present had before them was very meagre; they knew a very little of what they were asked to do, and Parliament ought to have complete information before it was asked to assent to the proposal now made. They knew something of the country which it was proposed they should give up, but they knew nothing or very little of the territory which it was suggested they were going to receive. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had told them that Gambia owed £5,000, and that it was very unhealthy; but that was a very small sum, and the sanitary condition might be improved. On the other hand, Gambia was a place well situated for trading with, and the civilization of Central Africa was a matter which was becoming of more and more importance to this country. All that they now knew of the interior of Africa, and all that he had heard from naval officers, led him to believe that the river Gambia would be a valuable means of communication with the interior. This country had made a bargain with the Dutch for the acquisition of some of their settlements; and what did either party get from the bargain? He believed that it got us into a war from which we had got out with some credit and much cost; while the Dutch had got into a war from which they had not yet got out. He found among the Papers, that we had nearly got into a small war on the Gambia through a very small matter. A panic had arisen among the residents; the Governor applied to the Colonial Office; the Colonial Office sent to the Admiralty; and the Admiralty dispatched a small vessel of war to the river; and then it was found that this grave complication had originated in a fraudulent message purporting to have come from an African king. The only person disappointed was the lieutenant in command, who, no doubt, expected to get his C.B., or perhaps to be made a Baronet. Their Lordships had been told that the Gold Coast was very unhealthy. Then, why should they increase their territory in that direction? It was said that though the Gambia was navigable for 300 miles it was a very unhealthy river. Well, was the Niger not also unhealthy? He believed the navigation of the Niger was not so good and the climate not healthy. Why had Gambia been so much depreciated? Trade had fallen off there because the traders had for 10 years been expecting to be transferred to the French Government. Why did the French Government want Gambia with its insalubrity, no trade, and with a large Mohammedan force around it? There must be some good reason for their wanting it. It might be that by means of it they would find easy access into the interior of Africa and they would be able in time to cut off the trade of this country up the Niger. This was a matter which must be much more fully looked into before Parliament could sanction it. There ought, he thought, to be a Committee to inquire into the whole question, as at present Parliament had heard only one side of it, and this possession might become very valuable to this country in the future.

tions to be considered were—what was the national interests in the matter?—what were the local and individual interests?—and, in case those interests conflicted, which should prevail? The first point to be determined, as to the national interests, was this—was it desirable to adopt, on the West Coast of Africa, a policy of territorial extension? If it were, then, no doubt, it would be worth while to make some sacrifices to acquire and preserve small outlying settlements as nuclei of future aggrandizement; just as a person, desiring to build up a great landed property, would buy plots of land here and there in hopes of being able to purchase up to them at his leisure. Was this our case? Some persons did seem to cherish the dream of a great West African Empire. Possibly it was with some such ideal before him that a correspondent of the Colonial Office desired to retain the command of the Gambia as the shortest road to Timbuctoo. Visions of this kind would scarcely find favour with their Lordships. But a less impracticable idea was that of uniting, by continued annexation, our scattered posts on the Coast, and thus by degrees rendering England mistress of the seaboard, and charging us with the control and protection of the Natives from the French Settlements on the Senegal down to the mouths of the Niger, and as much further as British trade might call us. In his (Lord Blachford's) opinion nothing could be more disastrous than such a policy, because it would be utterly impossible to perform properly the obligations which it imposed upon us. Our strip of maritime possessions would have at its rear the kingdoms of Dahomey and Ashantee, the warlike Mohamedans of whom the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had spoken, and other barbarous and slaveholding Powers of whom we had, as yet, happily no experience. Our duty would be not only to control our barbarous subjects, but to defend them against this line of enemies. And what were our means of performing these duties? Observe, to compare small things with great, how they were performed in India. You had there, perhaps, the best civil service in the world, composed of men attracted by high pay and hope of distinction, and devoting themselves to the service of their adopted country as a lifelong career. You had an English army furnishing an example and a means of control to the Native Forces attached to it. And these great civil and military forces we had found equal, indeed, but not much more than equal, to the task imposed on them. It was well known, but not sufficiently considered, that on the West Coast of Africa the deadly nature of the climate rendered all this utterly impossible. In that country appointments to civil offices were only possible on the understanding, or, at least, on the legitimate and well-founded expectation, that if a White officer showed industry and capacity he would be speedily transferred to a less dangerous post. He (Lord Blachford) had heard a Secretary of State say, with a bitterness which did him credit, that when he made an appointment to some of these posts he felt as if he was committing a murder. In respect to the military force, matters were, if possible, worse. The Horse Guards would give you no White soldiers. Even the West Indian coloured regiments had been withdrawn by the noble Earl. The Admiralty would not give you sailors, if they could help it. You might send out English policemen, but only to get drunk and die; and you had to do your work with the Native Force collected, he did not know, and he suspected the Government did not know where, and which you would not dare to make strong enough to overawe your enemies lest you should make it—what such forces rapidly become—too strong for its masters. If, then, the policy of extension were impossible, the arguments for the counter-policy of consolidation were irresistible. Where the territories of civilized nations interlaced in barbarous countries, the difference of their methods in the administration of justice, the punishment of criminals, the collection of revenue, the treatment of slavery, and other matters, distracted the minds of savages, whose obedience was secured only by intelligible consistency, and in numberless ways rendered effective administration impossible; while the rival policies and rival alliances of the Europeans gave the savages a means of embroiling us, which they were cunning enough to use, and subordinate officers allowed themselves to be engaged in disputes troublesome on the spot and sometimes of serious consequence at home. The true interest of all was that the limits of each civilized influence should be so determined as to afford the European Powers the utmost facility for effectively governing the Natives, and the least possible occasion for quarrelling among themselves. The exchange proposed by Government was evidently calculated to effect this, and therefore to serve the public interest. Then, as to local and individual interests. Those of the traders he did not rate very highly. The interest of British commerce was one thing, the interest of a few individual firms another. The whole profits of the trade at the Gambia did not amount to more than one large income, and the question was not, whether this should be destroyed, but whether there was ground for apprehension that it might be diminished. It was not reasonable that national policy should go out of its way on such a consideration. A much more serious question was our duty to the Natives. Great consideration was due to the interests and even sentiments of our subjects, provided, however, that the interests were real and the sentiments genuine. The noble Earl had shown that the Petition sent home against the cession did not represent the sentiment of the people. And what were their interests? Their most pressing want was of military protection. The Marabouts—a warlike and fanatical tribe of Mohamedans—had thrust themselves in between the French Settlements on the Senegal and the English Settlements on the Gambia. They had driven the inland tribes before them, and were now within a few hundred yards of our frontier. It was quite clear that sooner or later we should have to fight for the safety of our settlements. It was far from impossible that we might be fighting at this moment. Now, it might be right for the European Powers to meet hostility half way—it might be right to conciliate and temporize. It could not be right to do both. Yet this was what we were doing now. While the French were fighting serious battles with these invaders in front, the English were negotiating with them in the rear. A common course—the protection of our subjects—should dictate a common policy. This consistency would be secured by the union of this part of the coast under the French. And the people of the Gambia would be much safer under the wing of Senegal, and in the neighbourhood of a large military force, readily employed in their defence, than while sheltered by the mere prestige of English negotiations. Therefore, because the national interest was clear—the traders' interests insignificant—the sentiment of the Natives doubtful or divided, and their essential interests best consulted by the exchange—he gave his hearty support to the proposal of the Government.

THE DUKE OF MANCHESTER said, that though he regretted to do so he must oppose the proposal of the Government, because he regarded it as unwise, improvident, and unjust. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had correctly described the proposed exchange in his despatch to the Foreign Office, in which he said—

“By the arrangement now proposed France would receive, in exchange for one small isolated post, and certain claims to influence and jurisdiction of, to them, little appreciable value, an old-established European Settlement, with the command of the Gambia, which is one of the finest rivers in Africa, navigable for 300 miles into the interior for vessels of 10ft. draught.

The noble Earl might have gone further, for the Gambia was navigable for vessels of 100 tons for a distance of 400 miles from its mouth, and the Native traders came from Timbuctoo, the journey occupying 46 days. The whole case did not depend so much on the advantages of the Gambia as a settlement, as upon the question whether the proposal of the Government would attain the end it had in view. It was proposed that the French should give us two rivers and stations to the west of the Gold Coast in exchange for the Gambia. Now, the French had no jurisdiction, exercised no authority, and levied no duties in those places. The English trading there had just the same rights and position; and the Portuguese were in much the same situation. Our object in obtaining the cession of these stations was stated to be to levy customs duties on all the goods imported, and to prevent the introduction of warlike stores and intoxicating liquors. So far from this object being attained by the cessions proposed to be made by the French for the 100 miles of coast which would be acquired, there would be left 800 miles of coast over which we could have no control; and all along this coast there were stations of Portuguese, Danes, and Spaniards, who could import as much of warlike stores and spirituous liquors as they chose. As to the other river proposed to be ceded by the French to the north-west of Sierra Leone, that river had at its mouth certain islands which belonged to America, and, as the possession of those islands carried with it power to close the river, he could not understand what advantage the cession of the river would confer. As to the cessions to be made to us on the east of the Gold Coast, he could not gather from the Papers what the distance was to the head of the Bight of Benin, but it seemed to be about 10 degrees of longitude, and in that distance we had got only one station—Lagos—a small island in the most westerly mouth of the Niger—by means of which we could control these 10 degrees of coast. Altogether he thought this an unwise and improvident arrangement, and one most unjust to the people proposed to be transferred; for none of them had expressed approval of the transfer. The Papers endeavoured to make out a case for transfer; but Sir Arthur Kennedy had not ventured to say that even the French traders in the Gambia did not prefer the rule of the English Government, and the civil, religious, and commercial liberty they enjoyed under it, to the petty and vexatious restrictions which they knew would follow their subjection to French Colonial policy. For his part, he hoped the Government would re-consider the decision they had come to, and that they would abandon the project and endeavour to secure a more effectual control of the commerce along the Coast.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the ill results of the last transfer of territory, the bad effects of which subsisted still, were such as to make great caution necessary before sanctioning another, and as the Colonial Office had more on its hands than it could well attend to, in the Malay Peninsula, and the South African Colonies, it would be well not to undertake another affair which would cause further troubles. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had said that only a fraction of the Colony of the Gambia had petitioned against the transfer, and that there had been a change of opinion in the Colony since the late Government had first proposed the exchanges, but this was not so, for a further Petition with 400 signatures was now on the way here. The French were only able to cede a post on the Mellicourie River, they could not cede the populations, and now that the noble Earl had published the opinion of one of his Governors, that we were not a military nation, these populations might resist the cession. The noble Earl said he was going to remove a conflict of fiscal authority, and to do this he would have to occupy 800 miles of the Gold Coast with customs officers. He would read an extract from a letter of an African merchant, formerly President of the Marseilles Chamber of Commerce. After saying that the French residents in the Gambia Colony preferred that matters should remain as they were now, because change would disturb their trade, and the expense of the French Government would be higher; he wrote—

“I do not mean to say it is impossible to occupy the sea-coasts of these countries, but we must look forward to the most formidable opposition from the King of Dahomey, who will never agree to farm the Customs, nor to give up his territory. At Porto Novo I anticipate great difficulties also, and it seems quite certain that for a long time trade will be stopped and political complications will arise among the Natives.”

If this cession took place we should be certain to have a war with the King of Dahomey and he would have the Ashantees for allies; and the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had just said that the Ashantees had recovered their strength. He hoped the country would have an opportunity of pronouncing on this exchange before it was carried out, and that we should not complete the arrangement in the hurry with which we made our recent exchange with the Dutch Government.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he had little to add to what had fallen from the noble Earl (Earl Granville) behind him. In reference to the transaction which had been referred to by the noble Lord who had just spoken, he desired to say that no exchange of territory was made—the Dutch ceded to us certain forts they had on the Gold Coast, and we made certain concessions in regard to Sumatra; but there was no cession of territory on our side, and of course therefore no exchange. As to the proposed cession of the Gambia, the small part he had in the matter had been accurately stated; nothing that was done while he held the Seals of the Colonial Office precluded us from renewing negotiations at any time; and, indeed, it would have been very arrogant and rash on his part to do anything which should attempt to preclude such renewal. As to the merits of the question, it was one of considerable difficulty. The reasons for the cession had been forcibly stated; but, on the other hand, the wishes of the inhabitants against the cession were strongly expressed, and that was a material consideration to which the Government ought to give much weight. This was a matter in which sentiment could not be altogether disregarded; for it would be remembered that in the case of the exchange of territory which had occurred between us and the Dutch on the Gold Coast some years ago—an exchange which seemed mutually advantageous—the Natives resented it, the town of Commendah, which had been English, was bombarded, and other disturbances occurred, the memory of which still lingered at the time of the Ashantee War. All these things showed it was no slight matter to hand over the Natives of a Settlement from one Government to another. It might seem that the transference of Natives from one civilized Government to another civilized Government was a comparatively small matter; but the practical result was not so. The Natives clung to old habits and traditions, and there was no doubt they were attached to the flag they had been accustomed to see. He did not know what might be the results of the cession which the French proposed to make on the Gold Coast. This was a new matter, which did not enter into previous negotiations. So far as he knew, there were no actual French Settlements, although at Assinée a French merchant who resided there hoisted the French flag. If we were to acquire control over Assinée, with a view to prevent the importation of arms and spirits, the question arose, how were the objects aimed at to be attained? At present the merchants might import what they liked, and were we to establish our supremacy so as to deprive the merchants of the liberty of importation they had hitherto enjoyed? He did not say the object might not be advantageous enough if it could be attained; but it was not evident that it would be attained by the simple ratification of a treaty. From the Papers he gathered that his noble Friend had been much occupied with the consideration of our position to the east of the Gold Coast, where there were 300 miles of coast over which we exercised no control. If this exchange were carried out, it would be necessary to acquire something more than the right of the French, and to take possession of 300 miles of coast was rather a serious matter. It might appear on paper a great advantage we were going to obtain; but he had some doubt whether it would turn out to be so advantageous in actual result. Without wishing to express any opinion adverse to his noble Friend on this matter, and being most anxious that the effect of the policy of the Government might be to introduce civilization into that part of Africa, he still thought that sufficient doubt rested on the subject, as now presented to them, to make it desirable that further information should be afforded by the Government as to the manner in which their policy was to be carried into effect.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that the West Coast of Africa Committee on which he sat in 1842 had reported unanimously that the Settlement of the Gambia possessed advantages far beyond any other British settlement on that coast, and was likely to become of the highest value to the trade of this country. But the rumour that this cession was about to be made would naturally paralyze trade there. If the cession were made we were pretty sure to be exposed to a system of commercial restriction, which would discourage the trade of every nation but that to which the Settlement was to be transferred. The French had always acted on that exclusive principle. The question was, not what our trade with the Gambia now was, but what it might be under the happier circumstances in which that Settlement and the whole of Africa might yet be placed. He feared that for the trifling immediate advantages of improved police regulations, and a greater facility of collecting the Customs duties, we were giving up, or at least, endangering a great future trade, and were jeopardizing the opportunity offered us by that great navigable river of civilizing and Christianizing the interior of Africa. Upon the whole, he agreed with the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) that further information should be granted to Parliament before they were called upon to ratify an arrangement, which might, indeed, be convenient for the moment, but which put in peril the advantages we at present possessed on the West Coast.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE thought that by giving up the Gambia they would virtually be giving up the whole of Northern Africa to the French. The Gambia was at all times and seasons navigable for 300 or 400 miles, and the French had been always trying to get hold of that river. There was no river on the West Coast which afforded such facilities for trading with the interior as the Gambia. Therefore, he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would consider seriously before they decided to give it up.

ARMY—THE INDIAN AND HOME SERVICES.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government have yet come to any decision regarding the arrangements by which adequate provision for the Military requirements of India may be combined with short service in the Army at home?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had caused very careful inquiries to be made into the subject, but no decision with reference to it had yet been come to.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL gave Notice that on Friday, the 25th, on going into Committee of Supply, he would call attention to the injury which would result from the further postponement of a decision on this question.

SLAVE TRADE LEGISLATION—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Royal Commission alluded to in the Speech from the Throne as about to inquire into all Treaty engagements and International obligations bearing on the action of British National Ships in the territorial waters of Foreign States, will also be instructed to report on the expediency or otherwise of further Imperial Legislation on the subject of the Slave Trade?

MR. DISRAELI: In answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I must remind him that the instructions to the Commissioners will necessarily be of a very wide character, and it certainly does appear to me that one of those instructions will be to fulfil the duties to which the Question of the hon. Member refers.

TURKEY—THE GUARANTEED LOAN OF 1855.—QUESTION.

MR. W. GORDON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the present financial state of Turkey, any steps have been taken to insure the continued remittance to this Country of the securities pledged for the Guaranteed Loan of 1855, viz. the Egyptian Tribute and the Customs of Smyrna and Syria?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the engagement of the Turkish Government in connection with this loan was that the interest and sinking fund of the loan should form a charge upon the whole revenue of the Ottoman Empire, and especially on the annual amount of the tribute of Egypt which remained over and above the interest appropriated to the first loan, and, moreover, on the Customs of Smyrna and Syria. That was the security given for the loan. With regard to remittances, the Sultan engaged that he would cause to be remitted to the Bank of England, on or before certain days, one half-year's interest and sinking fund on the whole amount of the fund to be so raised, until it shall be paid off. Her Majesty's Government had every reason to suppose that the Turkish Government would fulfil their obligations in the matter, and therefore no special step had been taken with regard to it.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS AND HOSPITALS (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government have had under their consideration the Reports of the Endowed Schools and Hospitals (Scotland) Commission; and, whether they intend to bring in any measure in the present Session to carry out any of the recommendations of the Commission?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, the Government had considered the Reports referred to by the hon. Gentleman. They contained a large amount of valuable information with regard to the endowments relating to the elementary and secondary schools in Scotland. The Commissioners laid down certain principles which they recommended should govern the application of these endowments, and they recommended that an Executive Commission should be created to carry out the changes they proposed. As at present advised, the Government did not see their way to adopt the recommendation for the appointment of an Executive Commission. He might say, however, that, although the matter was still under consideration, they thought powers should be given to the local bodies and trustees themselves to adapt the management of the institutions under their control to the circumstances and wants of the present time.

METROPOLIS—REMOVAL OF SNOW.

QUESTION.

Mr. HEYGATE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What instructions are given to the Metropolitan Police, in order to secure the observance (in the event of a fall of snow) of the 60th section of the Act 2 and 3 Vic. c. 47, whereby a penalty "not exceeding forty shillings for each offence" is directed to be imposed on "every occupier of a house or tenement in any town within the said district who shall not keep sufficiently swept and cleansed the premises occupied by him," and, in the absence of any occupier, upon "the owner thereof?"

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the duty of enforcing the regulations for the removal of snow rested with the vestries and the district boards; and that, acting upon the instructions of those bodies, the police had been very active in calling the attention of the inhabitants of the houses to the necessity for carrying out those regulations.

INLAND REVENUE—TAXES ON CASUAL SERVANTS.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY PEEK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to more than one prosecution recently carried on at the instance of the Board of Inland Revenue or its officers, whereby certain persons employing boys for the casual services of boot and knife cleaning have been brought before various benches of magistrates and fined for not entering such boys (many of whom go regularly to school) as men servants for whom payment to the Revenue should be made; and, whether he will take some steps either immediately or during the coming financial year to stop such practice on the part of the Board and its officers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had heard complaints as to the prosecutions against persons for employing boys for the casual services of boot and knife cleaning and not entering them as men servants. He had made inquiries of the Board of Inland Revenue, and was informed that the Board did not consider the employment of boys for casual services in knife and boot cleaning—who jobbed their services to several employers—was liable to be taxed. The prosecutions which had taken place were in cases where a boy was regularly employed by a single employer in domestic duties. Such employment the Board considered did render the employer liable, because the law distinctly defined the term "male servant," not "man servant," to mean any male servant employed, either wholly or partially, in specified domestic affairs. The Board felt that in face of that definition they would be neglecting their duty if they did not collect in the ordinary manner this tax which Parliament had imposed. The fact that the persons prosecuted were fined proved that the Commissioners were merely carrying out, and not exceeding the law. In old time there was a limit of age, but this became a fruitful source of evasion, and it was omitted when the present licence duty was imposed in 1869.

ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE — CIVILIAN DOCTORS.—QUESTION.

MR. WARD asked the Secretary of State for War, How many civilian medical men are at present employed in the United Kingdom doing duty with troops?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that several civilian medical men were employed in the Army in the place of certain military medical men who were absent on leave, and some of them were attached to the auxiliary forces on special occasions.

NAVY—THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What arrangement he proposes to make to follow up the track of the Polar Expedition this year, with a view if possible to communicate with the ships; whether it is proposed that Captain Allen Young, in the "Pandora," should on his proposed voyage to the position of the "Erebus" and "Terror," fifteen miles N.N.W. from Cape Franklin, endeavour also to perform this service of following the expedition now absent in an opposite direction; and, whether a vessel will be sent which shall be exclusively devoted to effecting a communication with the Arctic ships?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the arrangements made by the advice of the Arctic Committee, and with the full approbation of Captain Nares, provided for the sending out of a relief ship in the Spring of 1877 to the entrance of Smith's Sound, unless the Expedition should have previously returned. A letter received from Captain Nares states his intention of sending a sledge party down to that locality in the Spring of 1876, if possible, with despatches, for the chance of a ship from England calling there. The Admiralty have arranged with Captain Allen Young, who was contemplating a voyage to the Arctic regions this year in his yacht, to look for cairns in which such despatches might be deposited; and he has, with great public spirit, consented to make this the primary object of his voyage, undertaking to bring home any such despatches, unless he can find means for sending them to England otherwise.

CATTLE DISEASE (IRELAND)—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.—QUESTIONS.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the regulations for slaughtering animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia will be put in force?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, for reasons which I have stated on previous occasions to the House, and which arise partly from the special circumstances of Ireland, but much more from the existing state of the law with regard to cattle diseases in that country, the Irish Government have felt unable to issue an Order for the compulsory slaughter of animals affected with pleuro-pneumonia. I hope in a few days to introduce a Bill proposing certain alterations in the law in order to meet the difficulties which have hitherto existed, and to enable us to secure uniformity of regulations on this subject throughout the United Kingdom.

Afterwards—

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Under what system will veterinary advice be afforded in Ireland to decide whether Cattle reported to have been attacked by pleuro-pneumonia are or are not affected with that disease?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, it would perhaps be more convenient that he should defer any statement on the subject until he introduced the Bill relating to it.

METROPOLIS—PUBLIC OFFICES AND IMPROVEMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. JAMES asked the First Commissioner of Works, If it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill for the purpose of appropriating the area within Charles Street, King Street, Great George Street, Westminster, and St. James's Park for the erection of Public Offices and improvements to the street approaches to the Houses of Parliament; if so, whether he will state further to the House the object of these contemplated changes, and their probable cost; and, if he can lay upon the Table the Plans and Estimates relating to the subject?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Yes, Sir, I have received the directions to prepare a Bill for the acquisition of the area included in the Question of the hon. Member for Gateshead. The object of that is to effect the concentration of the Government offices, now very inconveniently scattered in different parts of London. I am happy to think, also, that in carrying out this very necessary work a great public improvement will be effected. The plans for the distribution of the various offices are still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but when I introduce the Bill I will take care that both the plans and the estimates for the purchase of the area and for the erection of the offices shall be in the hands of hon. Members.

BRAZIL — OUTRAGE ON A BRITISH SUBJECT.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to an alleged outrage on a British seaman on board a French vessel called "La Cygne" at Pernambuco; and, whether he has any official information on the subject, or has taken any steps to procure it?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the attention of the Foreign Office had been called to this outrage within the last hour by a communication from the Board of Trade; but before taking action it would be necessary to communicate with the British Consul at Pernambuco, because the information he had sent to the Board of Trade was very incomplete.

MERCANTILE MARINE—RULE OF THE ROAD AT SEA.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the departmental Committee appointed last year to consider the Regulations in the Merchant Shipping Act, commonly styled the Rule of the Road at Sea, has reported; and, if so, if he will lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the Committee appointed by the Admiralty, the Trinity House, and the Board of Trade to consider the regulations for preventing collisions at sea have reported. Their Report, recommending certain amendments in the regulations, has been approved by the three Departments, and the proposed amendments will at once be submitted to foreign Governments. I will lay upon the Table of the House Papers showing what the proposed amendments are.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH STAMPS. QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Postmaster General, If he is aware that the recent order on the subject of Telegraph Stamps is much disliked by the mercantile community, and if he will explain the necessity which has led to the change, and say whether he intends the order to be strictly interpreted and enforced?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, he was not aware that the order in question had occasioned any inconvenience to the mercantile community. The change that had been adopted was an economical one, and he hoped that by means of it many thousands a year would be saved in salaries throughout the Kingdom. In order to produce that result, it would be necessary that the order should be strictly enforced.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure during the present Session for the improvement of the condition of the Irish National School Teachers as regards their salaries or pensions; and, whether anything will be done to indemnify the teachers in the non-contributory unions for loss of pay in consequence of the guardians in such unions having refused to become contributory for the years 1875 and 1876?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, it appears to me to be based on a misunderstanding of the arrangement which was agreed to by Parliament last year, under which provision was made for granting to the teachers of schools in contributory unions an additional sum for results' fees equal to that voted by the Guardians. The teachers of schools in non-contributory unions have not, of course, benefited by this, nor was it expected that they would; but even they have, as a body, received more in salaries and results' fees combined than they did in previous years. With regard to the first part of the Question, I must remind the hon. Member that the Act to which his Question refers only became law at the close of last Session, and has therefore been as yet so short a time in operation that the time can hardly be said to have arrived for amending it, particularly as its results has been to place the teachers' emoluments in a large and increasing number of Irish unions in a very satisfactory position. The question of pensions is still under the consideration of the Government.

NOXIOUS NUISANCES—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether there is any intention this Session of bringing forward a Bill for the repression of Noxious Nuisances?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I am afraid I am unable to say anything more definite in reply to my hon. and gallant Friend's Question than that the subject is, and has been for some time, under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

ARMY—THE BARRACKS AT ALDERSHOT.—QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Secretary of State for War, If it be true, as stated in a letter to "The Daily Telegraph," said to have been written by a Major in the Army at Aldershot, that three and often four families are crammed together in one room, without any attempt at separation even by screens and curtains?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Before the letter to which the hon. Gentleman refers appeared in The Daily Telegraph a complaint had been addressed to the War Office on this subject. Upon inquiries being made I found that in the Royal Artillery Barracks at Aldershot there was such a state of things as the hon. Gentleman speaks of—namely, four families in one room, in which there was no separation by screens or canvas. Directions have been given that such a state of things should be immediately put an end to.

PERU—GUANO.—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAGAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, seeing that the price of Peruvian guano is at present nearly £3 per ton higher in this Country than in America, Her Majesty's Government has called upon the Peruvian Government to equalise the price in the two Countries, in terms of a promise made on a former occasion by the Agent of the Peruvian Government, viz. that "the same price would in future be charged in this Country as was charged in America?"

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the Government had again urged upon the Peruvian Government that England was fairly entitled to receive the "most favoured Nation" treatment in this matter.

TURKEY—BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA. QUESTION.

MR. BRUCE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to the insurrection in Bosnia and the Herzegovina will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the Papers were extremely voluminous. They were being prepared, and he hoped that in a short time they would be in the hands of hon. Members.

MR. BRUCE gave Notice that on an early day he would call the attention of the House to and move a Resolution on the subject.

METROPOLIS—PICCADILLY AND GROSVENOR PLACE.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES LEGARD asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he proposes that the road from Piccadilly across the Green Park to Grosvenor Place, the Plan of which was placed before Parliament last Session, shall be soon commenced?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: In answer to the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough, I am here to admit, with great regret, that I do not see my way to carrying out the scheme of a road across the Green Park which was laid down on the model exhibited in the Conference Room during last Session. The model and the gradients marked on it were perfectly correct; but at the close of the Session I received communications from gentlemen of great experience, pointing out several serious drawbacks to the scheme which, I must confess, had up to that time escaped my notice. After going over the ground again, I felt there was so much force in some of these criticisms that I thought it better not to proceed with the work at that time. I have nothing further to add, Sir, but to express a hope that the House may be of opinion that, in the interests of the public service, it was better that I should stand here and with great regret confess to an administrative disappointment rather than that I should have forced on the carrying out of my scheme, to which some serious objections had been rightly and justly urged.

MERCANTILE MARINE—UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS—RETURNS.—QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the President of the Board of Trade, In how many cases, if any, a ship has been detained for survey on a requisition signed by one-fourth of the crew?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, a Return giving the information asked for by the hon. Gentleman was laid on the Table on the first day of the Session. In 22 cases ships had been detained on the application of one-fourth of the crew. In 16 cases ships had not been detained, in consequence of such complaints being considered frivolous by the Court.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion for a Bill relating to the Royal Titles.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

LEAVE.

MR. DISRAELI moved that the Paragraph in the Gracious Speech from the Throne relating to India and the Royal Titles be now read from the Table.

Paragraph from Her Majesty's Speech read:—

"I am deeply thankful for the uninterrupted health which My dear Son, the Prince of Wales, has enjoyed during his journey through India. The hearty affection with which he has been received by My Indian Subjects, of all classes and races, assures Me that they are happy under My rule, and loyal to My throne. At the time that the direct government of My Indian Empire was transferred to the Crown, no formal addition was made to the style and titles of the Sovereign. I have deemed the present a fitting opportunity for supplying this omission, and a Bill upon the subject will be presented to you."

MR. DISRAELI: After the reading of that paragraph in the Gracious Speech from the Throne, I have now to ask leave of the House to introduce a Bill which will enable Her Majesty to add to the Royal Style and Titles appertaining to the Imperial Crown of the United Kingdom and its Dependencies. After what we have heard from the Table the House will not require me to inform them that the change contemplated by Her Majesty refers to India. At the time when the Government of India was transferred to Her Majesty by the East India Company, who were her trustees, the propriety of some addition of this kind to the Royal Style and Titles was felt by persons of considerable authority in these matters, and was considered by the Government of that day, of which I happened to be a Member. The proposition was not at that time adopted; but, on the other hand, it was not negatived. There existed circumstances at the time which made us think that it might be premature; but the idea was not relinquished, and it has been one that has often occupied the speculations of those interested in Indian affairs. Since that period—since the transfer of the direct Government of India to the Queen—the interest felt by the people of this country in India has greatly increased. It has become every year deeper and wider. I remember when I first entered this House, now about 40 years ago, that there were, I believe, even Members of Parliament who looked upon India as a vast country which, generally speaking, was inhabited by a single and by a subjugated race. But since then information has been so much diffused among all classes of our countrymen on the subject of India, that even those who have the most ordinary information are now well aware that India is an ancient country of many nations; that it is peopled by various and varying races, differing in origin, in language, in religion, in manners, and in laws—some of them highly gifted and highly civilized, and many of them of rare antiquity. And this vast community is governed, under the authority of the Queen, by many Sovereign Princes, some of whom occupy Thrones which were filled by their ancestors when England was a Roman Province. The presence of the Prince of Wales in India has naturally increased and stimulated this feeling of sympathy in both countries. It is not for me to offer compliments to a Prince so near the Throne, but in fulfilling a public duty the language of truth may be permitted; and I am sure that I am justified in saying that, throughout this great enterprise on his part, his demeanour and his conduct have been such that he has proved that it is not his birth only which qualifies him for an Imperial post. Under all these circumstances, we have considered that the time has arrived when the original intention of Her Majesty and her Advisers should be carried into effect; and I have therefore to ask the House to-night to introduce a Bill which consists of only one clause, which will enable Her Majesty, by Proclamation, to make that addition to her style and titles which befits the occasion. In taking this course I am following a precedent, the validity of which, I think, cannot be impugned. At the time of the Union with Ireland, in the Act of Union itself, there was a proviso enabling the Sovereign, when the Act was passed, to announce, by Proclamation under the Great Seal, the style and title he would assume; and, accordingly, His Majesty King George III. issued a Proclamation under the Great Seal, and adopted the title of King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and its Dependencies. I propose in the present instance to take the same course. I have to ask the House to-night to give me leave to bring in a Bill which will enable Her Majesty to exercise her high prerogative, and to proclaim the addition to her style and title which she deems expedient and proper. I trust that the House will support Her Majesty's Government in the course they are adopting; because we have reason to feel that it is a step which will give great satisfaction not merely to the Princes, but to the nations of India. They look forward to some Act of this kind with intense interest, and by various modes they have conveyed to us their desire that such a policy should be pursued. I cannot myself doubt that it is one also that will be agreeable to the people of the United Kingdom; because they must feel that such a step gives a seal, as it were, to that sentiment which has long existed, and the strength of which has been increased by time, and that is the unanimous determination of the people of this country to retain our connection with the Indian Empire. And it will be an answer to those mere economists and those foreign diplomatists who announce that India is to us only a burden or a danger. By passing this Bill, then, and enabling Her Majesty to take this step, the House will show, in a manner that is unmistakable, that they look upon India as one of the most precious possessions of the Crown, and their pride that it is a part of her Empire and governed by Her Imperial Throne. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. LOWE: Sir, I cannot doubt that Her Majesty's Ministers would not have introduced this measure to the attention of the House unless they were aware that such a measure would be agreeable to Her Majesty's feelings. It is, therefore, doubly difficult for anyone to state any doubts or objections he may have on the subject. But this matter does not only concern Her Majesty—though, no doubt her feelings and wishes in regard to it are entitled to the greatest possible consideration, and I am sure they will always receive it from this House—but it also concerns the people of this country; and the view I take of it is that it is not without importance to their welfare. I hope, therefore, I shall not be thought to be acting disrespectfully in taking the opportunity of the first reading to lay before the Government and the House the objections which occur to me on this subject. I trust they may be carefully considered before the Bill reaches its second reading; and this, perhaps, may be the means of obviating some complications which it would be most desirable, if we can, to avoid, because the House can have no desire to do anything consistently with their duty, not agreeable to Her Majesty. I beg to be understood, then, as wishing merely to suggest to the consideration of the Government points of sufficient importance, as I think, to justify me in taking the rather unusual step I am taking at this time. Now, the first thing which it would be desirable to know is the exact meaning of the word "Imperial;" because, although the right hon. Gentleman has most properly foreborne from anticipating what use Her Majesty may make of the power proposed to be given her, we all know pretty well that what is pointed at is the addition of some title taken from her Indian dominions, and that title, I apprehend, can be only one of two—either that of "Queen" or that of "Empress." Now, I think it is extremely desirable that we should know, when we are dealing with this question, what we exactly mean by "Imperial," and what is implied by the word "Empress." Let me point out what is the law on this subject. It is not very abstruse. The notion of the Crown of England being an Imperial Crown is a very old one, as the 24th & 25th of Henry VIII. will show. At the time he had his quarrel with the Court of Rome he passed two successive Acts declaring the Crown to be an Imperial one. That was reiterated when James I. succeeded to the Crown of England and Scotland, and it was again reiterated in the year 1800 at the time of the Union of Great Britain and Ireland. It is, therefore, perfectly well established that the Crown of the United Kingdom of England, Scotland, and Ireland is an Imperial Crown. But still it remains to be seen what an Imperial Crown means. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, shows clearly that it means something very different from what was supposed by many persons. In page 497 of the second volume of Stephens' Blackstone, reference is made to the fact, that formerly the ridiculous notion existed that an Emperor could do many things which a King could not, and that all Kings were subordinate to the Roman and German Emperors. The meaning of the Legislature in using the word imperial was only to assert that a Sovereign was as supreme in this Kingdom as an Emperor was in his, and was not subject to any Potentate on the earth. Well, then, that being the meaning, what is the state of the case with regard to India? Is not India precisely in the position of an Imperial Crown? There is nobody else who can set up any claim of supremacy over Her Majesty, who holds the uncontrolled and undivided sovereignty of India. The matter, then, resolves itself into this—Her Majesty has precisely the same rights over the United Kingdom as over India, and yet—I am now going on the supposition that the title of Empress will be chosen—Her Majesty is to be called the Queen of one and the Empress of the other. In other words, we are to have the same thing designated by two different names. I can see no advantage which can possibly follow from that. To designate the same thing in different ways can only lead to confusion and mischief. It is, in fact, opposing two things to each other, between which there is no opposition at all. Then the practice of the country is worth notice. As the right hon. Gentleman has said, the Act of Union of 1800 authorized the style and title of King or Queen for the Sovereign of the United Kingdom, and accordingly on the 3rd of January, 1801, George III. declared his style and title to be that of "King of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith." My memory is at variance with that of the right hon. Gentleman as to the use of the word "dependencies," though I do not pretend to put my recollection against that of the right hon. Gentleman; but according to my recollection in the Proclamation the word "dependencies" is not to be found. That is a matter of great importance in this question. The King took as his description in Latin Georgius Tertius, Dei Gratia, Britanniarum Rex, Fidei Defensor, and in English he was described as "George the Third, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith." I quote this Proclamation at this particular time to show, that although George III. was possessed of an Imperial Crown, yet, acting on the advice of statesmen and lawyers as eminent as any who ever adorned Parliament, he did not think fit to take the title of Emperor, but contented himself with that of King. Then we come to the transfer of India to the British Crown, in 1858. Here we have a precedent of particular importance, because it may be said to have received the assent of two distinct Governments, having been prepared originally by the Government of Lord Palmerston and completed by that of Lord Derby. Both Governments, no doubt—certainly that of Lord Palmerston—very carefully considered the question, and did not think it advisable to add anything to Her Majesty's title. In these matters precedent goes for a great deal, and I have just brought under the notice of the House two cases in which the title of Emperor might have been and was not assumed by Sovereigns of this country. I question very much the expediency of breaking away from a custom established for so many centuries, in the matter of the title of our Sovereigns. But though this is the legal meaning of the title of Emperor it has in ordinary parlance a very different meaning. If what it is now proposed to do is right, there is no reason why Henry VIII. might not have called himself by the title of Emperor. Indeed, before the Conquest some of our Sovereigns did call themselves by the name of Emperor; but as the nation improved, and as liberty increased, they fell back on the good old title of King. The constitutional maxim laid down by legal writers is, that the King ought to be under the law because the law makes the King. The law of Imperial Rome says just the contrary. The doctrine it lays down is that in all things the will of the Emperor is to be accepted. That is the popular notion of an Emperor. Another idea entertained concerning an Emperor is, that he is one who has gained his power by the sword, and that he holds it by the sword. But if we consider a little shall we find it wise and prudent, in dealing with a country like Hindostan, to make a marked distinction between the two countries by giving to our Sovereign a title which implies obedience to law, and to their Sovereign a title which implies the supremacy of force? Why should we give the idea that we won India by the sword, and that we mean to keep it by the sword? That may be true; but is it wise to state it? Is it not one of those things that had better not be put prominently forward? The Emperors of Hindostan were Mahomedan conquerors. Would it be wise or prudent in us to confound in name our wise and beneficent government with that of the Rulers who preceded us? Would it not be much better for us to teach the Natives of India that those men reigned for their own pleasure and gratification, the welfare of their people being a secondary consideration; and that our object, on the contrary, is simply to do as much good to the people under our Government as possible, and to spend their money, not in luxury, debauchery, and show, but in promoting their interests materially and morally? There is another objection to the title of Empress—a rather sentimental one perhaps, but which has, nevertheless, some weight with me, particularly as we know that “young India” now reads classics and history. Which would furnish the better associations in their minds? Whether the memories and deeds of the noble line of Kings that have reigned in England from the time of Egbert, who have associated their names with the glories of her history, and with the triumphs of her civilization; or of the wretches who have filled the throne of Imperial Rome, who have been often raised to their position by military violence, and who sank below ordinary human nature in debauchery and crime? If we have two sets of associations, why choose the worse? Taken altogether, our history for 1,000 years will compare favourably with that of any other country in the world for the same period. What I would urge in view of all this is that the assumption by Her Majesty to the title of Empress of India would not be a wise or judicious course. There still remains the question—which I have not yet touched upon—whether Her Majesty might not with propriety assume the title of Queen of India. I am sure the House will see, even if this discussion be rather dry, how very desirable it is that matters which are not fully understood by everybody should be fully stated. As far as I am concerned, it is my utmost wish, if we can, to comply with Her Majesty's desire. Suppose we say the Queen of India. The Queen is Defender of the Faith. “Defender of the Faith” is a title which has done much hard work in its time, from the period when

Henry VIII. received it for supporting the Roman Catholic faith, and retained it after he had suppressed that faith. Therefore, as the title has borne so much, it may be considered that it can bear a little more. Supposing it to be the wish of Her Majesty to assume the title of Queen of India; the title would run something like this—Her Majesty, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland and India; Defender of the Faith. Then the question would arise, "Whose faith?" If we were to take the grammatical construction, it would mean the faith of India; but some people might wish to be more explicit and add an "s," so that it would read Defender of the Faiths. This is a difficulty which I do not say might not be overcome, but I do say it is not merely ludicrous. It illustrates the difficulty of putting on new titles upon those old time-worn English titles which have got a meaning of their own beyond what they had when they were first instituted. It is, in fact, like putting a new patch on an old garment. I have two other difficulties on this question which I wish to state, and one of these is that I suppose there is no greater marvel in the world than the conquest of India by England, except the feat of retaining it at this moment. Most of us remember how very near we were losing India some 20 years ago. ["No!"] Well, that was the impression then, at any rate. Suppose the Crimean War had lasted another year, and then that the rebellion had taken place, instead of giving us nearly a year's breathing time, might not this country have been put to a great extremity? It is quite possible, at any rate. We cannot regard our position in India with the confidence we feel with reference to the possession of Hampshire or Sussex. I want to know what sort of feelings the Parliament of the day would have when they came to alter the style of Her Majesty and blot India out from her titles. We once believed ourselves to be the conquerors of France, and our Kings assumed the title of Kings of France; but the French beat us out of France, and left us only with a single small town in it. In 1450 our chance of ruling it was utterly destroyed; but how long was it before we could make up our mind to give up the title of "King of France?" It was not till 1801, 350 years after the last possible opportunity of getting it back had disappeared, and some 130 or 140 years after our King had condescended to live upon the moneys doled out to him by Louis XIV. That shows the inconvenience of loading yourselves with titles which you are not sure of retaining. The last objection which I have is much more powerful, and I hope it will receive the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government—a favour which I hope will also be extended to the other points I have urged. The Queen is Sovereign of other dominions besides that of the United Kingdom. Among these other dominions is India; but India is not the only one, and it is by no means the most important one. Certainly, it is not the dominion of which we have most reason to be proud. There is no use going back on the history of our connection with India; what is done is done. We gained our Colonies in gallant action, fighting our equals in civilization and the arts of war. We won them gloriously, we held them by the strong hand, and none of them have since had any reason to repent that they came under our rule. We planted them with a hardy and industrious race of men, and enabled them to become in due time the mothers of nations, and the seeds themselves of great Empires. There is nothing of which England has more reason to be proud. We have founded colonies, like Australia for instance, of which we have every reason to be proud, without shedding a drop of blood. Well, what do you think these great communities will say if they find India—of which I will say nothing that is not perfectly fair and respectful—selected to be placed above them, although in no respect so important to this country? It will be putting aside our own flesh and blood, our own descendants, who have so nobly vindicated the character of England in every quarter of the globe, by their industry and success, in order to bestow this extraordinary mark of Royal favour and approbation. Having been a colonist myself I am quite certain this slight will be extremely felt. I should be sorry to find it was not, because it would prove, what I do not now believe, that our fellow-countrymen in the different colonies and dependencies of England do not care whether or no their connection with the mother country is maintained. No doubt it would be a sufficient answer, if the right hon. Gentleman could give it, to say that the colonies were mentioned in the Royal style, and, therefore, that we only have to add India to complete it. But the colonies never have been mentioned. The definition of a colony is a settlement beyond the seas to which Acts of Parliament do not apply unless it is named in them, but which is under the Crown. The colonies are no parts of the United Kingdom, nor are they, properly speaking, dependencies — these words apply to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. To pick out India now, and put a slight on all these great communities, is a matter which I think ought to be well weighed by the House. If my argument has more warmth than my undertaking warrants, my excuse is that I wish the question may be fully and completely laid before the House, the Government, and Her Majesty; and I hope, if these difficulties cannot be avoided, that their statement will lead to a re-consideration of the whole question, or if they can, when the measure again comes before us, that it will be in such a form that we shall have no difficulty in accepting it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he thought it right to disclaim any community of feeling with the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, so far as regarded the particular arguments which he had adduced. Being connected with India himself, he was proud Her Majesty was about to take a title which would indicate that we had taken India, and that we meant to keep it. He was not afraid that Her Majesty should take the title because a day might come when this country would lose India. He doubted if that time would come; and he did not believe it would come for a long time. He thought it well that Her Majesty should mark the position which this country held in relation to that country, by assuming a title connected with India. What that title should be it was not for him to say; but he must remark that he hoped the title would be one which would distinctly mark the Imperial character of our rule. He thought that the time had come when Her Majesty should assume in name, as in effect, the position hitherto occupied by the Great Mogul in India. When he said that he did not mean that Her Majesty should personally assume the position of an absolute Sovereign; but he said that She, as the Representative of the British Nation, should occupy Imperial power, and be superior to all other power in India. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had said that India under Her Majesty was ruled by Princes; but four-fifths of India was not ruled by Princes at all, and our greatest interest was connected, not with the Princes, but with the ryots of India. No doubt, a considerable portion of India was ruled by Princes under the British Government; but he thought that the right hon. Gentleman was in error when he spoke of them as coming of ancestors who held their position when Britain was a Roman province. The history of the Princes in India was very much shorter than that, for all the greatest of them were creations of the last century. The only Princes who were of very ancient ancestry were the chiefs of clans, like the Highland clans in this country. He did not know that there was any Prince with a very ancient family who held a higher historical position in India, at any rate in his eyes, than the Duke of Argyll in Scotland. He repeated that the ancient Indian Chiefs were very much in the position of our Highland Chiefs; but there were more modern families who occupied, under the Great Mogul, a very high position, as they did now under Her Majesty. It was politic, therefore, that some title should be taken by Her Majesty to mark her superiority to those Princes; but, as regarded the position of Her Majesty in relation to this country, it was not desirable that She should hold personally the position of the Great Mogul in India; and he assumed that Her Majesty's Ministers would take such measures that Her position would not be inconsistent with the control of Parliament, and that it should be within the four corners of the Constitution of the Realm.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that they had had a long dissertation from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) upon a subject which was not really before the House. He had assumed that Her Majesty would be advised to take the title of Empress of India; but there was nothing before them to show this. As the question, however, had been raised in the course of the discussion, he (Sir George Bowyer) would say that that Crown was not inferior to that of any other country. History showed that the title of Emperor was derived from the Roman Empire—from Cæsar; and the idea of a Roman Emperor was that of a King over other Kings, a potentate who had for subjects tributary Kings. This seemed to him to meet the difficulty which had been raised. In India the Queen was undoubtedly the Sovereign over Sovereign Princes. It might be all very well to compare the Princes of India to the Duke of Argyll; but the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was perfectly right, for there were Rajahs in India, Sovereign Princes, whose families went back more than 1,000 years, and whose ancestors had always been great Princes in that country. There were other Princes whose origin was more modern, who had great armies and vast territories—as, for example, Scindia. The idea of an Emperor, that of King over Kings, was an Oriental idea, as was shown by the title Shah-in-Shah, and the Queen in India might well be called a Sovereign over Sovereign Princes. He thought that this was a sufficient answer to what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). Then the right hon. Gentleman came to the title “Queen of England,” and he was so difficult to be pleased that he was not even satisfied with that. He said that what was proposed would offend the Colonies. But the Sovereign’s title had never been taken from the Colonies. Sovereign titles also were mostly taken from conquest, and we had taken India by conquest. Then he objected to the title of “Defender of the Faith;” but he (Sir George Bowyer) did not see any difficulty in disposing of that obstacle. The Queen might be called “Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and Queen of India.” This would 240,000,000, and were beginning a deeper interest in its welfare notion of governing India by—at one time a necessity hoped, for ever abandoned, had every confidence that that of the Prime Minister, if ceded as it would be by the Heir to the Throne to India, since the people of that country were anxious that our rule should be one of strict justice, and the desire was that we should long possess her to be an honour to the Imperial Crown.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am for the purpose of saying that I do not complain of the form in which this Bill is brought before the House, that of giving power to the Queen to assume what title She may think fit; yet I venture to say that I think the House will be informed before they read what the title will be, that we should be deprecating our respect for the Queen, and should not be showing due regard to Her wishes—and, indeed, I think we should not be doing our duty to our subjects—if, in a matter so closely connected with our position as subjects, we take the opportunity of expressing our opinions with regard to this. I confess that I think it is possible that a title might be assumed to which, from motives of loyalty, we ought to make some objection. I agree with my right hon. Friend that the word “Empress”—although I do not know that either the Queen or the Crown would suggest that as a word not very suited to England, and the Imperial idea of government, is not one very pleasing to English ears. I would prefer the old phrase, Queen. Again, if we are given this an opportunity to convey our expression to our Indian fellow possibility of what may be omitted. If there is any change, there ought to be allusion to the colonies. It would be right to them if they were omitted. As our Sovereign is called King of Great Britain and Ireland, and the colonies are included; but if India be omitted the colonies will feel that it ought at least to be mentioned. I doubt that is found to be a practical difficulty. The Prime Minister was under the impression that in the first half of this century a Proclamation was issued alluding to the "dependencies." The right hon. Gentleman would see that it was not the case. [Mr. Disraeli: It is in the Act.] What is in the Act, that there is power to do so? The King should think fit. The Act is—

"The Act shall pass by the name of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Royal style and title appertaining to the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies should be so as by our Proclamation we should appoint."

It is, however, no mention of the colonies in the Proclamation, and that is practically the difficulty. Of course the right hon. Gentleman would not like to call our vast colonies "dependencies," and I am only pointing this out as a practical difficulty. I suppose, I suppose, was felt at the time of the change of rule in India, for the Proclamation there alludes to both the Kingdom and the dependencies. It was never passed in England or passed by the Council in India; but I suppose it was without Her Majesty's Government giving some disavowal to the proposal that, in assuming this new title they were advising the Queen to assume new powers and new prerogatives as regarded the Princes of India which the Queen did not at present possess. It was to be very much deprecated that it should go forth to the people of this country and of India that observations had been made in this House by a Gentleman having a large acquaintance with India, calling upon the Government to advise Her Majesty to assume the powers of the Great Mogul. Having some knowledge of India himself, he strongly protested against anything of the kind, because it was most unadvisable and dangerous. Many years ago a certain doctrine was started by a former Governor General of India as to their being Lords Paramount of India, which had its effect in the assertion of the Government with regard to cases of adoption. The power they had received a rude shock in the Sepoy War, and at its close, when the Government of India was assumed by the Sovereign of this country, the Government of the day issued a Proclamation disavowing those doctrines, and announcing that the rights of succession which the Native Princes held so dear would be respected. That precedent might, in his opinion, be followed at the present time. He would not enter into the question as to the meaning of the titles of Emperor and King; but he thought the people of India would watch the matter very

a word or two about it. The right hon. Gentleman had said truly that the Crown of this Realm had always been held to be Imperial, in order to meet the idea that an Emperor held power over a King; but he (Sir George Bowyer) apprehended that if Her Majesty should decide to take the title of Empress of India She would take that title in a very different sense from that in which the Crown of England was called Imperial, which was with the view of asserting that that Crown was not inferior to that of any other country. History showed that the title of Emperor was derived from the Roman Empire—from Cæsar; and the idea of a Roman Emperor was that of a King over other Kings, a potentate who had for subjects tributary Kings. The Queen might be called “Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and Queen of India.” This would dispose of the objection which had been raised. He was sure that the assumption of a title by Her Majesty—be it that of Queen or Empress—with reference to India would give great satisfaction in that country. It would give the inhabitants of India the feeling that they were no longer to be ruled as a dependency acquired by conquest, but that both the Sovereign and people of England took a pride in that great Eastern dominion, with its population of 240,000,000, and were beginning to have a deeper interest in its welfare. The notion of governing India by the sword—at one time a necessity—was, he hoped, for ever abandoned, while he had every confidence that the proposal of the Prime Minister, if carried, preceded as it would be by the visit of the Heir to the Throne to India, would convince the people of that country that we were anxious that our rule there should be one of strict justice, and that our desire was that we should long continue to possess her to be an honour and a glory to the Imperial Crown.

men, let us endeavour to convey a true one. If we convey the idea of personal rule, it would not be a true impression. The Queen governs over them, as over us, with the assistance of the Lords and Commons—of her Parliament; and it would not be right, or wise, or true to give a notion to the vast multitudes of India that in her dominion they would have anything approaching a personal government. Another reason why I am very anxious to know what the title is to be is the possibility of what may be omitted. If there is any change, there ought to be an allusion to the colonies. It was never issued in England or passed by the Council in England; but I suppose it was sent here for approval by the Council, and I find it in The Times of December 6, 1858. It is a Proclamation by the Queen in Council to the Princes and people of India. It is stated to be by the “Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Colonies and Dependencies thereof in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australasia;” and I think it is desirable that this should be borne in mind. If after this India was added, and no allusion made to the great colonies of Canada and Australia, I think there would be a discontent, which I should be glad to see exist, because the absence of it would show disloyalty.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE desired to express his total dissent from the observations of the hon. Member near him (Sir George Campbell), and he hoped this debate would not close without Her Majesty's Government giving some disavowal to the proposal that, in assuming this new title they were advising the Queen to assume new powers and new prerogatives as regarded the Princes of India which the Queen did not at present possess. It was to be very much deprecated that it should go forth to the people of this country and of India that observations had been made in this House by a Gentleman having a large acquaintance with India, calling upon the Government to advise Her Majesty to assume the powers of the Great Mogul. There is, however, no mention of the dependencies in the Proclamation, and this shows practically the difficulty. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman would not think of calling our vast colonies now "dependencies," and I am only pointing this out as a practical difficulty. A difficulty, I suppose, was felt at the time of the change of rule in India, for the Proclamation there alludes to both colonies and dependencies. It was never issued in England or passed by the Council in England; but I suppose it was sent here for approval by the Council, and I find it in The Times of December 6, 1858. It is a Proclamation by the Queen in Council to the Princes and people of India. It is stated to be by the "Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Colonies and Dependencies thereof in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australasia;" and I think it is desirable that this should be borne in mind. If after this India was added, and no allusion made to the great colonies of Canada and Australia, I think there would be a discontent, which I should be glad to see exist, because the absence of it would show disloyalty.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE desired to express his total dissent from the observations of the hon. Member near him (Sir George Campbell), and he hoped this debate would not close without Her Majesty's Government giving some disavowal to the proposal that, in assuming this new title they were advising the Queen to assume new powers and new prerogatives as regarded the Princes of India which the Queen did not at present possess. It was to be very much deprecated that it should go forth to the people of this country and of India that observations had been made in this House by a Gentleman having a large acquaintance with India, calling upon the Government to advise Her Majesty to assume the powers of the Great Mogul. Having some knowledge of India himself, he strongly protested against anything of the kind, because it was most unadvisable and dangerous. Many years ago a certain doctrine was started by a former Governor General of India as to their being Lords Paramount of India, which had its effect in the assertion of the Government with regard to cases of adoption. The power they had received a rude shock in the Sepoy War, and at its close, when the Government of India was assumed by the Sovereign of this country, the Government of the day issued a Proclamation disavowing those doctrines, and announcing that the rights of succession which the Native Princes held so dear would be respected. That precedent might, in his opinion, be followed at the present time. He would not enter into the question as to the meaning of the titles of Emperor and King; but he thought the people of India would watch the matter very closely and anxiously, to know if under it any extra power or authority was assumed; and in the event of the House advising Her Majesty to adopt this new title, a Proclamation ought to go forth assuring the Native Princes and the people of India generally that no more was meant by the title than the words themselves conveyed. With regard to the Native Princes, of whom his hon. Friend had spoken so alightingly, and almost contemptuously—[Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: No, no!]<sup>1</sup>—well, perhaps he meant to compliment them by comparing them to Lord Lorne. These Native Princes held their rights under treaties by which they entered into voluntary engagements with the British Government, and which placed them, it was true, in a certain position of dependency; but they were as much the champions of their rights and held them as dearly as the inhabitants of this country do the liberties they enjoy. Nothing was more to be deprecated than our assuming power beyond these treaties.

MR. NEWDEGATE, while no one was more anxious that everything should be done to secure and, if possible, enhance the dignity of Her Majesty's titles, hoped nothing would be done to disturb, directly, or indirectly, or in any way, the title by which the Queen and Her Majesty's predecessors had been long honoured as Kings and Queens of the United Kingdom. He remembered that in 1850, with reference to the question of a new coinage, an attempt was made to abridge the title of Her Majesty. It was sufficient at that time to call the attention of the House to the change that was contemplated, in order to induce the Government of the day to abandon the idea of curtailing Her Majesty's title as Queen of the United Kingdom. The Crown of the United Kingdom was undoubtedly Imperial by the title of centuries. Nothing could add to its force, and it could only lose by being tampered with. Whatever additional titles Her Majesty might be advised to assume, he trusted that Her Majesty's present title to the Crown of the United Kingdom—"Victoria, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith," would remain inviolate.

MR. ANDERSON said, it was somewhat premature to discuss the Bill. It was quite true that so far they had had no proposal that the new title should be Empress of India, but that would be the question of interest. If the title of Empress was combined with that of Queen, they would have to consider what those terms meant. If they had the same meaning, one or the other must be superfluous; but if, on the other hand, they had different and opposing meanings, the one must contradict the other.

We need not go back to the history of the words in order to find out their meaning, because the people of this country would be content to take their ordinary acceptation of the meaning—namely, that "King" or "Queen" was a constitutional title, and that "Emperor" or "Empress" was a despotic title. Consequently, to add "Empress" to the title of the British Queen would be derogatory to her. He sincerely hoped it would not be attempted, and he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that it would be a slight and an insult to our great colonies if we took up India and left the others out altogether. He should, indeed, be surprised if the colonies did not regard such an attempt with great indignation. If they did not, it would mean that they cared little about us. He would suggest that Her Majesty's title should be "Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, of Canada, Australia, India, and South Africa." That title might be inconveniently lengthy; but it would not insult either of our colonies.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) himself must have felt that, with the exception of his last remarks, he was scarcely able to attract the attention of the House. There was one feature about them which did not surprise me, and that was that the right hon. Gentleman contemplated, as the basis of his argument, that we should one day lose India. He is the only right hon. Gentleman in the House who would have offered an argument of that kind. The right hon. Gentleman is a prophet, but he is always a prophet of evil. Whether retaining our rule in India, or attacking a war in Abyssinia, I am always prepared to hear from the right hon. Gentleman a prophecy of the dark-coming fortunes of this prosperous country. Then, the right hon. Gentleman says that the precedents are against us. He says that the Government of Lord Palmerston, which had to consider the state of India, and the Government of Lord Derby, which had to construct the new Constitution for India, both declined taking the step which I have to-night asked the House to advise Her Majesty to take. But is it not obvious that there were ample and sufficient reasons why the Ministries of Lord Palmerston and Lord Derby should not have considered it then expedient for the Government of this country to take a step of this kind? Why, when our swords were reeking with carnage in terminating a mutiny of almost unequalled magnitude, that certainly was not a period when we could advise Her Majesty to make an addition to Her titles. Though I did not care to mention the subject, that, of course, was the reason why, in the Administration of Lord Derby, we did not take the step which we for some time considered. Then the right hon. Gentleman said his last observation was one worthy of the attention of the House, and of a most serious character. That was as to the slur we are now putting on the colonies by the course I am indicating by the introduction of this Bill. We need not now go into any argument, after what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) has said, on the language of the Act of Union and the Proclamation. It turns out, as was my first impression, that by the provision in the Act of Union Parliament enabled the Sovereign to proclaim his style and title for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and its dependencies. But I was first met by a denial that that language was in the Act.

MR. LOWE: I said there was nothing about it in the Proclamation.

MR. DISRAELI: When the King, who had to carry into effect the provision of the Act of Parliament, considered what was the style and title which would adequately and completely represent his position as a Sovereign, he described himself as King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, because the dependencies were contained in that title, because he felt that the colonies were contained in Great Britain and Ireland. Therefore, as to the alleged slur, I think, on the contrary, it would be a slur to introduce the names of the colonies into this Bill. It would be a slur to tell Australia and Canada and the men of New Zealand—"You are to create a specific title for the Sovereign, and are not to rank amongst the population of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." Considering the intimate relations between our colonies and the United Kingdom—considering that this House of Parliament is strengthened and enlightened by several Gentlemen who distinguished themselves in the colonies—it is absurd to suppose that our colonial fellow-subjects misconceive the spirit in which we are proposing to legislate; but, on the contrary, I believe there would be great cause of complaint if we drew a line and made a distinction between those of Her Majesty's subjects who live in the United Kingdom and those who are to be found in Canada or elsewhere. Still there is one point upon which I would make a remark, and that is with reference to the observations of the hon. Baronet the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), with regard to the possible misconception of our proposal by the Indian Princes. I have no fear of that. Certainly, this Bill is not brought in merely to gratify the Indian Princes; but with a conviction that it will be a source of satisfaction to the many millions of people who in India obey the rule of Her Majesty the Queen, but I may say, that we happen to know that, as far as any particular class in India is concerned, it is the Native Princes who will be peculiarly gratified if this step is taken. I must still describe them as a numerous body of Sovereign Princes. The statement that some are of very great antiquity I was surprised to hear doubted, for it is a subject which is capable of demonstration. Others, it may be, are of more recent origin; but in the majority of cases they possess large armies, vast treasures, capital cities, and millions of subjects. During the visit of the Heir Apparent to India these Princes have been brought very much together at courtly festivals and on occasions when His Royal Highness has held investitures of knightly orders. These last assemblies have, more than the merely festival occasions, brought the Princes into intimate relations with the Crown; and while they have felt proud to be the feudatories of a great Power, they have felt anxious that some steps should be taken in order to bring them more closely into union with the Crown. I think, therefore, that to the Indian Princes this course which we suggest will be most gratifying. My hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) deprecates any change in the titles of Her Majesty; but I would remind him that the present Bill, so far from making any change, would merely enable Her Majesty to add to the titles She at present possesses—therefore, the fears of my hon. Friend have no foundation. I trust, therefore, that the House will allow me to introduce this Bill. Of course, every observation that has been made will receive grave and sincere attention on our part; but it is because we are convinced that it is a matter of high policy that this step should be taken that I press upon the House for permission to introduce this Bill, and to ask that it be now read the first time.

MR. BRIGHT: I do not intend to add a word to the debate on this subject, which has been so interesting; but the question which has been asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), as to whether the Government will state what is intended to be done before the Bill comes to a second reading, is an important one, to which no answer has been given. I think hon. Members who are quite willing that something should be done, and hon. Members who think nothing is necessary, will be equally anxious to know what is intended to be done before they pass the Bill. For what we are doing affects, no doubt, the sentiment of the people, not only in the United Kingdom, but in every part of the Empire, and it affects also, not only those who are now living, but those who are to come after us. Therefore, I think the House is entitled to know what is intended to be done before it passes a Bill giving the power to do something in regard to a matter which we deem to be of considerable importance.

MR. DISRAELI: I would just point out to the right hon. Gentleman that if I give the information which he requires—I do not say, so far as I am personally concerned, I will or will not; but I am now speaking abstractedly on the point—if I give the information which he requires, we shall not pass a Bill enabling Her Majesty to use and assume titles which She thinks expedient; but that, on the contrary, we shall be binding Her Majesty down to use only that one we shall have passed. It is quite unusual to take that course; it was not taken in the former instances to which I have adverted; and it would be an invasion of the just Prerogative of the Crown which certainly ought not to be rudely touched. At the same time, it is well known that Her Majesty has hitherto exercised her Prerogative in the most gracious manner, and I will only say at present that I hope the House will allow the Bill to be introduced.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he thought that as Queen was the title held by Her Majesty as the head of the United Kingdom, a State with a Constitutional Government, She ought to be styled Empress of India where the Government was despotic. In Austria, Francis Joseph was Emperor—for there his Government was a despotism—but in Hungary, the Constitution of which differed very materially from that of Austria, he was King. India was not a representative Government, but a Government of Lieutenant Governors and Commissioners not elected by the people of India.

MR. GOLDSMID begged to say, that the Government of Austria was no more a despotic Government than the Government of England.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to enable Her Most Gracious Majesty to make an addition to the Royal Style and Titles appertaining to the Imperial Crown of the United Kingdom and its Dependencies, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DISRAELI, Mr. Secretary CROSS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, and Lord GEORGE HAMILTON.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL—[BILL 49.]
(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

MR. RATHBONE said, he thought hon. Members might congratulate themselves that they were approaching this difficult and intricate subject in a state of feeling admirably calculated to lead to a satisfactory conclusion. The discussion, so far, had been generally marked by an evident desire to approach the subject with fair argument and without the introduction of irritating language. No one could listen to the speeches of the Members of the Government without seeing how carefully and thoughtfully they had inquired into and weighed all the considerations that ought to affect legislation; and he believed it would be a great relief to all those who understood the real difficulties of the question to know that the Government had taken their stand on the sound principle of English legislation—that a shipowner was to be allowed to conduct his business with the freedom enjoyed in other trades, but held strictly responsible for the use he made of his freedom. Had anybody supposed it possible to combine the two incompatible principles of minute Government interference and direction and shipowners' responsibility, their minds must by that time have been disabused of the notion. The hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had himself fully and frankly admitted the impossibility of this double responsibility. He stated plainly that if the system of Government surveys and load-line which he advocated were adopted. He (Mr. Rathbone) would use his own words—

"In the absence of proved subsequent neglect, of course it should relieve from responsibility, as also a properly ascertained and determined load-line should relieve from responsibility for overloading if that line is not submerged. We have practically asserted the responsibility of the shipowner when we require him to repair his ship, and when we define the point beyond which he shall not load, and to talk therefore of holding him responsible if accident occurs even while these requirements are complied with, is unreasonable and absurd."

Many shipowners were at first inclined to accept a proposal which would relieve them from responsibility on condition of their compliance with certain minute but clearly laid-down regulations; but they soon saw that, in the first place, it was impossible for Government to assume such a responsibility; and, in the second place, that if it did, it would inevitably lead step by step to such an amount and detail of Government interference—such a gradual and inevitable tightening the iron machinery of Government control—that would crush the very life out of the trade, and utterly prevent improvement and progress. Suppose the Government survey given and the Government load-line fixed, and a certificate of seaworthiness granted to the loaded ship, Government would have dealt with a very small portion, and, in ordinary cases, by no means the most important portion, of the elements of safety for a ship. Government had already ample powers to stop cases of very excessive and conspicuous overloading, and, short of such very excessive and conspicuous overloading, the way in which a cargo was stowed was of far more importance to the safety of a ship than the exact depth to which she was loaded. Was it intended that Government officials were to watch the stowage of every ship and to certify that it was properly done; because, if not, would not the other certificate that the ship was properly loaded, because her Government load-line was not submerged, have the inevitable tendency of setting at rest the consciences of shipowners and the vigilance of the underwriters, the shipper of cargo, the sailor, and the surveyor, whose interested vigilance was far more effective than any Government control? The investigations made during the Recess had clearly shown the danger which must result from a general adoption of Government surveys. On this point he could refer with confidence to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Board of Trade and to the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), who, to the great satisfaction of the whole Mercantile community, was now the Parliamentary Secretary to that Board. They had visited together during the Recess several of the seaports, and had examined sailors, captains, surveyors, engineers, machine makers, shipbuilders, and shipowners, and he would appeal to them to endorse his statement that from the evidence of those persons the surveys of passenger ships under the Board of Trade had prevented the safest, the most economical, the most effective, and the best form of ship and machinery being adopted. They stated further that they had been repeatedly compelled, in compliance with the rules of the Board of Trade and the demands of the surveyors, to do that which they did not consider was the most desirable for the safety or the efficiency of the vessel. This evidence came from men who were connected with the most wealthy and powerful shipping companies in the Kingdom; and if men in their position, with wealth and influence at their back, and able, therefore, to hold their own with exceptional vigour against the Government requirements, had been hampered by them, what must be the effect of such a system upon the less wealthy rising set of shipowners to whom we must look for improvement and progress? One of the most valuable parts of the present Bill was that which gave a prompt appeal from the surveyor's decision to skilled referees in doubtful cases; and the mere fact that there was such an appeal would tend to make the surveyors more careful, and their decisions, when confirmed, would carry much more weight with the shipping community. Carrying public opinion with them, their work would be not only more easily, but more effectually done. The hon. Member for Derby offered the option of compulsory classification, and perhaps the most practical answer to that suggestion was, that the largest and most important steamship owners declined to class their ships at all. Out of over 750,000 tons of the leading steamship lines which were represented by the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association—an association representing one-third of the whole steam tonnage of the Kingdom—over 400,000 tons were not classed in any public register. The reason for that was, not because the owners wished to build ships inferior in strength or quality to Lloyd's requirements, but because they wished to build them in a different and superior manner, and to have their hands free to introduce such improvements as they thought desirable, without having to consult the Committee of either Lloyd's or of the Liverpool Registry as to whether they might do so or not. Besides those Liverpool steamers, those of the Peninsular and Oriental Company and of the Royal Mail Company, and other large London lines were unclassified. That was a practical assertion of great authority and weight that compulsory classification was not desirable. Could it, on the other hand, be shown that the great loss of life at sea which had so naturally excited public interest would be prevented by classifying the whole shipping of this country? From the Report of the Royal Commission it appeared that there were in six years 5,316 lives lost by ships where the cause of loss was ascertained; but of these 5,153, or 97 per cent, were lost in vessels which there was every reason to believe were seaworthy, and only 163 were lost in vessels from unseaworthiness. Besides these lives lost from known causes, there were 5,345 lost in missing ships, the cause being unknown, and of these 4,223, nearly four-fifths, were lost in classed ships, and only 1,122 in unclassified ships. It was, therefore, clear either that the great bulk of these missing ships were not lost through unseaworthiness, or, if they were, that classification was no security against it. Lloyd's, the Liverpool Registry, and the Bureau Veritas were all very well managed, and most useful societies as voluntary societies, and would be generally used by shipowners where there was no great change or improvement going on in the model or machinery of ships; but to make their rules compulsory would impede progress, and could have very little effect on loss of life at sea. But it might be justly contended that those who represented shipping communities ought not to be content with merely demonstrating the dangerous tendency of proposals for legislation, but should show plainly what they thought could be done to diminish unnecessary loss of life at sea. In what he was about to say he might assume that everybody interested in merchant shipping had read or would read the admirable article in the last Quarterly Review, for it contained, in the shortest space possible, the most complete account of the facts and principles of legislation concerning shipping. It was evidently written by one who had made the matter the study of his life, and who viewed it not from a shipowner's, but from an official and executive point of view. Clause 3 of the Bill, which was a repetition of the misdemeanour clause of last Session, would have a most beneficial effect in saving life. It would impress upon the mind of the most thoughtless that it was a crime wilfully, or by criminal negligence, to send an unseaworthy ship to sea, and the effect of that on public opinion would be more powerful than the deterrent effect of that clause itself. But there were undoubtedly some trades in which there had been unnecessary loss of life, to which we might with advantage direct our attention. These were, principally, the export trade of dead weight—coal and iron—from this country, and the import trade of grain and timber into this country. Now, with regard to the outward trades of iron and coal, as they started from ports in this country, the legislation of 1871 and 1873, with that of last Session, gave ample power to the Board of Trade to deal with them, and survey and stop any ships that they had reason to suppose were either defective or overladen, and all that was needed now was good administration rather than fresh legislation. Again, the clause in the Act of last Session dealing with the grain trade, introduced by the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed), enacted what was requisite in this respect; and what was now required was such arrangement for the administration of the law that it should be effectual. But with respect to deck-cargoes of timber, he was not sure whether it would not be necessary to go somewhat further than the proposal of the Government; for, from all connected with the trade whom he had been able to consult upon the subject, he had received but one opinion—that the great loss of life in the timber trade arose from carrying deck cargoes in the winter season; and they all agreed in thinking that if the law could be made to affect all, so as to put all ships, foreign as well as British, on the same footing, deck cargoes of timber ought to be prohibited altogether in the winter season. That, however, was a matter for consideration in Committee, and when the Bill got there, he thought it would be possible to show how the object sought might be obtained by a clause not open to the objection made by the President of the Board of Trade to the proposal of the hon. Member for Derby. Before sitting down, he must try to get rid of certain confused ideas which seemed to have possessed the minds of many who were not acquainted with ships and shipowners. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Pembroke that it was most undesirable to speak of shipowners as if they were better than, or in any respect different from, the rest of humanity; but, arguing the question solely upon the most plain, clear, and pure self-interest, it was a most extraordinary delusion to suppose that the great body of respectable shipowners were interested in protecting the owners of unseaworthy ships or overloaded ships from interference or punishment, and that all shipowners must be regarded in this matter as biased witnesses, whose opinion and testimony were to be received with hesitation, as men whose aim and interest would be to throw a shield over the culprits. So far from that being the case, we could not confer a greater benefit on respectable shipowners than, in the first place, to prevent unseaworthy ships being sent to sea and to cause them to be broken up, or, failing that, to drive them under foreign flags; for, if they were to sail at all, they had far better, in the interests of British honest shipowners, sail under a foreign flag. An unseaworthy ship under the British flag injured the British shipowner in three different ways. It exposed him to an unfair competition; it increased the insurance which he had to pay, for the underwriters so regulated their premiums that the ships which went habitually safely paid for the ships that were lost; and, thirdly, an unseaworthy ship under the British flag degraded the British flag, and to that extent put it to a disadvantage in competition with other nations. But while we must do all we could by wise and sound legislation, based on the principles that were applied to other trades, to make our shipping as safe as possible, we must be careful lest, by unsound legislation and excessive interference, we drove the heavy trades which were in their nature more difficult and dangerous than other trades under a foreign flag. If we did this we should cause two evils—we should drive these trades from under the British flag, out of the reach, therefore, of that reasonable and wise legislation and control which might be productive of great benefit; we should thereby increase the risk to life which we were attempting to prevent, and we should lose to this country trades which were absolutely necessary to its prosperity and maritime safety. It was in these heavy trades, carried on in sailing ships, that we made good sailors. The work of a large passenger steamer, or a Government steamer, containing everything that human ingenuity and great wealth could provide to make her safe and effective, with its minute division of labour, was no school for seamanship, energy, or resource. It was the practice of some, if not all, of the larger steamship owners not to take even as a first mate, with a view to his ultimately becoming a captain of a steamer, any man who had not served for a certain time as captain of a sailing vessel. As in former times, so now, it was the much-abused sailing ships of the north-east of England that turned out the finest seamen the world could produce. The introduction of steam had brought with it dangers in this respect, which were the subject of constant anxiety to careful steamship owners—and the danger had not been unfelt in the Royal Navy. Considering the large and varied interests which he represented, he hoped he had not intruded unreasonably on the attention of the House. He had tried to show that, in the legislation which was desirable to prevent loss of life and property at sea, it was not necessary—nay, that it would be dangerous—to deviate from the English principles of leaving the action and energy of our citizens free and unfettered by minute Government direction; but holding them to a strict account for the use of that freedom, when they injured or attempted to injure others thereby. He had spoken with some confidence, for he had taken the utmost pains to gain from practical men of all kinds the results of their experience; and the answers to these inquiries had been so uniform that he had acquired an almost certainty that the line taken by the Government in their Bill was wise, statesmanlike, safe, and much more likely to be effective than if we were to adopt the Continental plan of Government surveys and minute interference, which those who had tried it admitted to have failed.

MR. GORST said, that there was a general feeling of regret in the country, that the Government had not dealt with that part of the law of Merchant Shipping which regulated the relations between seamen and their employers. These relations were embodied in a code of laws which was at once very peculiar and very stringent. This code was consolidated in the Merchant Shipping Bill of last year, and underwent a great deal of discussion. Several Amendments were introduced into it, and many of its more stringent provisions were only carried by narrow majorities. Towards the close of last Session, Parliament passed two most important measures, by which the general relations between employers and employed were placed on an entirely new footing, and when it was announced that the Government intended to legislate on Merchant Shipping it was expected that they would apply the principles contained in those Acts, as far as possible, to the merchant seamen. It was evident that in order to maintain life at sea men must be subjected to certain rules and discipline. Sailors causing loss of life or serious injury to property by deserting should be subjected to penalties in accordance with the principles of the 5th section of the Conspiracy Act, 1875, and therefore the only excuse for special legislation was to stop desertion in cases where there was no danger to life or property. If any workman, except a seaman, broke a contract he could only be sued for damages in a civil Court; but a seaman who deserted, although that was simply breach of contract, was liable to be imprisoned on summary conviction for three months with hard labour, and to forfeit all his effects left on board, and all the wages he had earned. Again, if a seaman were absent from his ship, no matter from what cause, 24 hours before his ship was due to sail, he could be sent to prison for 10 weeks, forfeiting his wages to the extent of two days' pay. Many other illustrations could be given of the stringent and peculiar penalties to which seamen were subject. Would Parliament venture to impose on any other class of workmen penalties of this kind for breach of contract? But the objection to the law was trifling in comparison to the objection to the procedure by which it was enforced—a procedure to which we did not subject our criminals. A seaman found absenting himself without leave might be arrested by a master or mate, or any other person, without warrant, and it was not necessary to carry him before a magistrate, unless he required it. That need not be done then, however, if no justice of the peace happened to be near the place where he was apprehended. He might at once be taken by main force on board ship and compelled to fulfil his duties. Would they empower any other class of employers to enforce performance of contract by so tyrannical a procedure? There was another reason why these laws ought to be amended. A seaman might be seized in the colonies, in spite of any colonial legislation; so that it was in the power of the mate of any ship to cause the most serious complications between the mother country and a colony whose laws on the subject of merchant seamen were more enlightened than our own. Seamen were as respectable a class and as much entitled to the protection of the law as any other class in the country, and he believed they would never have been treated in this manner if they had had the same electoral influence as other working men. If, however, they were as degraded as some people alleged, it might easily be shown that the class laws to which they were subject tended to bring about such a result. He, therefore, hoped the Government would, in Committee, introduce a code of law relating to the relations between merchant seamen and their employers which should be more in accordance with the enlightenment of the present day, and carry out, so far as was practicable, those principles which the House and the country adopted last year.

MR. A. PEEL said, in common with every other hon. Member, he could not but rejoice that at last they saw the prospect of the settlement of that question for some considerable time to come. The House, he was sure, was now prepared to deal with the subject in a calm spirit, without respect to party, and with a sole view to the welfare of our Mercantile Marine. He held that the establishment of Government survey, to the extent which some proposed, would weaken the responsibility of the shipowner, and as the principle of the liability of the shipowner, which was the one they had in view, had been asserted in the Bill, he was anxious that nothing should be said that would tend to impair its application to the fullest extent. The Government, however, seemed to doubt the application of their own principles, for they had filled the Bill with clauses that showed they mistrusted the shipowner, and wished to prevent him from doing that for which they said he was responsible. In dividing the country into districts under Wreck Commissioners the Government, he believed, were following the advice of a gentleman well known at the Board of Trade (Mr. O'Dowd); but he could have wished they had followed that gentleman's advice a little further and abolished advance notes, which were a cause of improvidence, and of so many ships going to sea with drunken crews. ["Hear, hear!" and "No, no!"] He knew there was much difference of opinion upon the subject; but he (Mr. Peel) believed the system of advance notes might be very safely done away with, or at least modified in such a way as to be no longer a main source of the vice and misery of the seaman. The question of laying down rules for the proper loading of ships was one of such difficulty that the idea which had been carried out by the Board of Trade of summoning a conference of experts in order to determine the general instructions to be issued to inspectors as a guide on the subject was almost amusing. Judges of the highest character entertained widely different opinions on this question. Even the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had not been quite clear on the subject before the House.

MR. PLIMSOLL, in explanation, said, that he held that no particular rule should be laid down, but that each ship should be judged according to the circumstances peculiar to her case.

MR. A. PEEL said, that as regarded the proposed Superior Court, to which appeals might be made from the decisions of surveyors, he did not think there was any ground for complaint; but with respect to the proposed Court of Inquiry, supplemental to the present Court of Justices assisted by assessors, he thought the essential difficulty of the case still remained. There would still be the danger of criminating somebody, and by whatever Court the inquiry was held, there would remain, and always must remain, the risk that the civil or criminal liability of the master or owner would affect the course of the enquiry, and divert attention from what was the main point of investigation—namely, the cause of the casualty. He did not think any sufficient grounds had been shown for the change, and he should like to know exactly what were the motives which had prompted the Government to introduce this great machinery of Wreck Commissioners, stipendiary magistrates, and special assessors, when no substantial grievance was alleged against the old system. He wished to know whether it was intended, in the clause respecting shipowners' liability, to make them responsible for anything which happened to seamen from the act of their fellow-sailors. If this principle were laid down in the Bill, the railway companies would be on the qui vive; their position would be a serious one if they were held responsible for accidents to men in their employ from the acts of their fellow-servants. As to the proposed certificates of health, he hoped they would answer, but his hopes were small. The Act of 1844 provided for certificates distinguishing able-bodied seamen from seamen of any other class; but these certificates soon became a dead letter. He was sorry to criticize the Bill, to which he was not hostile; his sincere desire being to facilitate its passing and settle a question which was not only of great importance, but one of great difficulty.

Dr. KENEALY expressed a desire to say a few words on this important subject. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was actuated by the truest desire to advance the interests of the Merchant Shipping service and the welfare of our seamen. There were, however, parts of the Bill which were open to misconstruction, and should be amended. One clause provided that an owner sending an unseaworthy ship to sea should be guilty of a misdemeanour, unless he proved that her going to sea in such a state was, under the circumstances, reasonable and justifiable. Now what circumstances could justify the sending of an unseaworthy ship to sea? The clause should be made more stringent. The next clause of the Bill related to prosecutions, and laid it down that no prosecutions should be undertaken unless by the sanction of the Board of Trade. That, in his opinion, was most objectionable. The greatest violations of the law took place in consequence of persons not being at liberty to institute prosecutions, because they had not received the sanction of the Attorney General; and in a matter of such great and vital importance as the Merchant Shipping Bill, he apprehended that the public would be apt to think the Government were not sincere when the clause provided that no prosecution should take place except by the sanction of the Board of Trade. He would also suggest to the right hon. Gentleman, that the persons appointed for this particular service under the Board of Trade should be persons who had been in the Mercantile Marine, and of great experience. There was another point which related to what was called ships permanently retired. What did the right hon. Gentleman intend to do with those ships? As he was informed, some of them were in such bad condition that their timbers, if the ships were broken up, would not be found available for any useful purpose. There was another point to which he deemed it necessary to call attention, and that was as to the importance of the manner of stowing grain. As he understood from experienced authority, the best manner of stowing a cargo of grain would be by putting it into bags; and he submitted that the owners of ships should be compelled by a provision in the Bill to have cargoes of grain secured for carriage in bags. Another important point was that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade should not allow loads to be carried on deck. That was a matter calling for the serious consideration of the House, and heavy penalties should be imposed on owners who might allow deck-loading on board their ships.

Mr. T. E. SMITH said, on looking over the Bill, he could not again enter upon the discussion of whether it was desirable to have "grandmotherly legislation" for taking care of merchant ships and seamen. There were one or two points which shipowners regarded with considerable regret. The first was that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had not brought in a measure dealing with other ships besides British, and thus put British and foreign vessels on an equal footing. The effect of the present Bill would be that many ships would be transferred to foreign flags, and their owners would thus evade the provisions of the Act. He objected to Clause 4 on the ground that it adopted an entirely new principle with regard to seamen, and one which had no existence in the case of other trades in this country. Shipowners were entitled to meet with due consideration at the hands of the Board of Trade, inasmuch as he thought it not right to make them answerable for acts of their captains and seamen, when those parties were away at sea, and not under their control. Railway companies were in a far better position; they had the means of exercising supervision over their lines day by day; but not so with shipowners, who knew nothing of what occurred on board their ships when those ships were away at sea, and who therefore ought not to be held responsible in such cases. That was a matter which he hoped would meet with due consideration in Committee. With regard to the new Court proposed to be established by the Bill, he thought it would prove very satisfactory; and with regard to the appointment of two assessors by the Board of Trade, he thought it more desirable that one of the two should be appointed by the local Marine Board. With respect to the danger to life from deck-loading, he thought the practice of putting 20 or 30 tons of coal on the deck of steamers leaving port, in the hope of burning them before bad weather came on, most dangerous, and that a clause should be embodied in the Bill to prevent it by the infliction of severe penalties. He regretted, with regard to deck cargoes, that there were any exemptions. He had little faith in attempts to put down deck cargoes of timber; and, with reference to the extraordinary statement about abolishing bulkheads, he always thought they strengthened ships. He believed when they had a fleet of ships under this Bill without bulkheads, there would speedily be an end to the Mercantile Marine of this country. One result which he did look forward to from the present measure was that there would be a material reduction in the cost of ships.

MR. PLIMSOLL said, he approached the consideration of the question with very great anxiety, he wished, however, to make a few remarks to remove, if possible, some false impressions as to the course he had taken, created by exaggerated statements. The comparisons which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade ranged in the most extraordinary and mysterious manner over different periods, indeed, the speech itself was a perfect dance among statistics, and he (Mr. Plimsoll) confessed that when he heard the right hon. Gentleman impugn what he had said as to the loss of life, on the authority of a Lloyd's Report, it seemed that it was really impossible there could be any foundation for the charge. He had, therefore, obtained the Report, and looked carefully over it, and he found that the right hon. Gentleman had compared two different periods for his Returns—namely, 1832-35 and 1870-73; but, in speaking of wrecks, he began with the year 1836, and therefore the comparison was not fairly made. He submitted his own statement on the subject, together with the official document, to the Statistical Society, and asked them to provide a return which would be accepted as authoritative on the subject. For his own part, he had dealt but very little with statistics, and his statements of facts had been based upon the findings of Courts of Inquiry, official Returns, Parliamentary Reports, official documents, and other papers of the highest kind; and he now found that the exaggerations of which he was accused were two—first, that one night last Session he had overstated—very slightly—the loss of life in the last year; and secondly, that, whereas, when he spoke of a ship not having been heard of he ought to have said she foundered. But what happened in consequence of these alleged small discrepancies? Three hon. Members of that House upon different occasions and at widely different places had attacked that statement, each of them as if it was a separate error, so that he had been subjected to no fewer than 11 attacks, because he had misstated the total loss of life for one year. The inference was, he thought, irresistible, and that was that those hon. Gentleman would not have fiddled so long on one string if they had had another on which to play. It was not, however, for him to defend these figures, he would let them defend themselves. Then, with respect to the loss of life, the Board of Trade altogether ignored the great improvements which had taken place in the number of light-houses, life-boats, and other appliances which had been introduced of late years for ensuring safety, and the result of their calculation was, that supposing a steamer made five trips in the time it would take a sailing vessel to make one, we should consider ourselves well off if there were only  $4\frac{1}{2}$  lives lost by the steamer as compared with one by the sailing vessel. When the first iron vessels were constructed the iron was of the best quality, equal, in fact, to the plates of the best iron boilers, and they were practically unsinkable. He had talked with the captain of one of those ships which had run right against an iceberg and lost all her masts, and yet made her voyage home in safety. Since then it was well known that a very different quality of iron had been used for the construction of such vessels in many cases. It was, he could not help thinking, much to be regretted that the whole matter should thus have been thrown into confusion, for the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was one to which it was difficult to make a reply without trespassing unduly on the attention of the House. He might, however, be allowed to refer for a moment to the latest "Wreck Register"—a document which had been issued by the Board of Trade, and the evidence furnished by which he presumed the right hon. Gentleman would not call in question. In that Report it was stated that of the total number of ships lost on our own coasts in 1873-4, the loss of 30 was attributable to defects in the ships or their equipments, and of the 30, 19 appeared to have foundered from unseaworthiness. Referring to the casualties during the second period of the year, still on the coasts of the United Kingdom, the Report stated that 91 had occurred from defects in the ships and their equipments, so that the loss of 121 vessels in one year was attributable to unseaworthiness. These facts in themselves, it seemed to him, furnished ample evidence that some legislation on the subject was urgently required. In page 10 of the Report it was further set forth that 1,000 had been lost when the force of the wind did not exceed a strong breeze, and that there had been 314 casualties when the ships ought to have been able to hold their course against the wind which prevailed. There were many statements of a similar kind contained in the Report which he did not deem it necessary to quote, and he would now address himself to the Bill before the House, with which he was not at all surprised to find that the shipowners were not displeased, for from beginning to end of it the shipowner appeared to him to count for everything and the sailor for nothing. The Bill sought to protect the sailor by providing certain legal remedies against the shipowner, while it gave to the sailor certain legal rights. He had, however, no hesitation in saying that those legal rights would in the hands of our seamen turn out to be useless, for the penalties to which shipowners were to be made liable would be of very little value, judging from the fact that there had been in 1873-4, as he had just stated, 121 casualties owing to unseaworthiness, while only 22 vessels out of the unseaworthy ships sent to sea within a given time were stopped. He was not surprised at this, because he and they all knew how cheap professional evidence was, and when testimony of that kind was given, the men of course had the matter decided against them. He did not object to the clause, but he did not think it would do any good. He had, indeed, not heard of one single shipowner having been prosecuted by the Board of Trade in England, and only of two in Ireland. Nor from the answer which had been given to him that very day by the President of the Board of Trade did he think the legal rights which the Bill would confer on the sailor would afford him any better protection. He did not think seamen were proper judges of the seaworthiness of vessels, and it was unfair to shipowners that they should be exposed to great loss by giving to ignorant men the opportunity of stopping vessels. The law committed this ridiculous folly—first of all it made the seaman a judge, and then if, however sincere he might be, he made an error, it treated him as a criminal and sent him to gaol. In the case of scurvy, every one knew that it could be prevented by a proper supply of healthy, good food. The Government took care, that in the case of passenger and emigrant ships the provisions were surveyed as a matter of course, but there was no such survey for seamen's provisions. The Act 17 & 18 Vic., c. 104, s. 221, provided that three seamen might demand a survey under certain circumstances, but he had not heard of its ever having been done, and it gave an instance how sailors exercised their legal rights. He had before him a list of four vessels belonging to one firm, and on board them 18, 24, 4, and 35 men were dreadfully afflicted with scurvy. Fifteen out of one ship's company died. In order to avoid strong feeling in the matter, he thought it better not to name the firm to which these vessels belonged. The strange thing, however, was, that whenever men suffering from scurvy were landed and able to obtain wholesome food they got better. He was told, though he did not state it as a fact within his own knowledge, that the Admiralty sold their beef and pork when they were no longer fit for the Royal Navy, and that they were supplied to merchant vessels. As he had on the Paper a Motion for Returns on this subject, he would only remark now that if the beef and pork were bad they ought to be destroyed, and not sold to unscrupulous men to spread disease and death on board ship. He believed that with respect to health on board merchant ships, the last Returns of the Board of Trade showed that scurvy was very prevalent, and that a very large proportion of the crews were landed in such a state that they had at once to be sent to their friends or to hospitals, while in some cases the disease was so bad that the ship was unable to continue on her course. Now, if men who suffered so frightfully never dreamt of bringing an action-at-law against their owners, what was the use of the legal rights they possessed? The legal liability imposed on the owners and the legal rights conferred on the men were, in his opinion, perfectly valueless. As to the proposed Court of Survey, he sincerely hoped it would not be established. It would be the Board of Trade over again, and in its dealing with the Mercantile Marine that Department seemed to have united the maximum of meddling with the minimum of management. He wondered that shipowners had not insisted long ago on the total re-organization of the Board of Trade and demanded a special Board of Commissioners, consisting of retired shipowners and shipbuilders, who knew all about their business, and who would be able in a very short time to bring about the necessary alterations with the least possible trouble. Such a body ought to have power to make by-laws about undermanning, boats, and other matters which were essential, but which could not be crystallized in an Act of Parliament. When this was done we should see daylight, and he was persuaded that in a very short time there would be a wonderful diminution in the loss of life at sea, and such an addition to the comfort and safety of the men as would make it no longer difficult to man our vessels, while respectable men would not be ashamed, as they were at present, of beginning life as sailors. With respect to the load-line there was no supervision provided either at the port which a vessel was cleared outwards, or at the port of unloading; and the clause as to grain-loading as it stood in the Bill would be perfectly valueless. Then with respect to deck-loading, the provisions respecting which would be practically nugatory, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade dealt with that practice in an entirely new way, for through Mr. Thomas Gray, he wrote to Lloyd's Committee and asked them to investigate this subject. That Committee accordingly nominated two gentlemen of great experience, who examined the data of 6,830 voyages made by timber-laden ships from North American ports while deck-loading was prohibited, and in the 10 years following the removal of the prohibition. Although the traffic was now three times as great, and consequently men have a better chance of escape in the event of vessels becoming water-logged, yet it was found there were four times as many lives lost since the prohibition of the practice was swept away as were lost during the period when the prohibition existed. To neglect to deal with that question in the Bill, or deal with it in an ineffectual manner was very silly. The load-line proposed by the Bill seemed to be an owner's load-line, but there was no principle laid down for guidance, and if he chose to put it on the bulwarks probably no one would interfere with him. He objected to the proposal, because owners were often shopkeepers, without the special and technical knowledge requisite for that purpose. It was his intention, instead of recognizing the owner's load-line, to ask for the appointment of a Commission to examine all such load-lines, with power to provide a proper freeboard wherever necessary. The Bill was also defective in not providing a penalty for a wrong load-line, but he should endeavour in Committee to supply the omission. The Bill provided means for better investigating casualties than now existed; but the difference between his proposal and the proposal of the Government was this—that he advocated precaution, while they advocated subsequent inquiry; but the precaution would be infinitely cheaper and more efficacious for the object in view, and when the Bill went into Committee he hoped to give good reasons for inducing Parliament to accept his proposal. Training ships were affected by the Bill, and he saw no reason why little orphan boys at present running through the streets—the waifs and strays of society—should not be taken into training-ships and made seamen after we had got some seaworthy ships, supplied with good provisions. The loss of life at sea, however, was at present so great that it would take a great many of those training-ships to meet the demand for sailors. He had heard of one shipowner, a Member of that House, who had lost 28 men within the last year, and of another, also a Member, who had lost seven ships, whereby 100 seafaring lives were sacrificed. If there were to be such a waste of the raw material as this, he thought the House would pause before it expressed satisfaction with, or assented to, any arrangement such as the Government proposed. Let life be first made safe at sea, so that nothing but unavoidable danger and hardship would have to be encountered, and then there would be no disposition to begrudge any amount of money for training ships. What he submitted to the House was this—that ships which needed repair should be repaired, and that ships should not be allowed to be overloaded. Let there be an efficient survey, so that vessels which had gone through their classes, and were unfit to carry coal and ore on coast voyages, should no longer be entrusted with human lives. On these points, then, it was his intention to join issue with the Government by asking for a compulsory survey. His Amendments would be drawn by able counsel and in a conciliatory spirit, anxious as he was to consult the wishes and interests of shipowners to the utmost. Those Amendments he would give the Committee an opportunity of deciding on by their vote, and might God defend the right.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, it was not his wish to offer any observations upon points which must be more fully discussed hereafter in Committee on the Bill; but there were one or two subjects upon which some misconception existed not only in regard to the provisions of the Bill, but as to the action of the Board of Trade as the Department charged with the administration of previous Acts. It was stated the other day, as it was also said last year, by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), that it was not the custom of the Board of Trade to hold wreck inquiries, except in cases in which the guilt of the captain in command was concerned. That was not the case, for reports were made in all cases by the Receivers of Wrecks, and if from these reports an inquiry into the circumstances of a wreck seemed to be desirable, the Board of Trade always ordered such an inquiry to be made. In corroboration of that statement, if hon. Members would look through the Wreck Registers they would find that Courts of Inquiry were held where the guilt of the master was not concerned, but where there was reason to believe the vessel was either not seaworthy, or was overloaded, or was an improper ship for the purpose for which she was employed. An objection had been taken to the existing Courts of Inquiry, on the ground that the civil and criminal proceedings were mixed up together. In the dropped Bill of last year a proposal was made on the part of the Government to distinguish between the civil and criminal liability of the captain. That proposition had been abandoned this Session, for the reason that if an inquiry were held into the causes of a casualty, and if the certificate were left to be dealt with by some Court afterwards, the certificate would never be dealt with at all. In small cases the witnesses would never be kept together. Moreover, in such inquiries it was found, as the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel) had pointed out, that it was, in practice, impossible to separate the civil and criminal proceedings. It would be found that when there was anything hanging over the head of the master, and when it was possible that his conduct might be made liable to future condemnation, whether in a Court of Law or by public opinion, then in any formal inquiry the master's mouth was sealed, and it was, therefore, unnecessary and useless to hold two inquiries instead of one. Now, how did the Government propose to deal with this case? First, they proposed to establish a superior class of Judges, called Wreck Commissioners. In the first instance, they proposed to appoint a Wreck Commissioner, specially qualified for the purpose, to sit in London, where it was found impossible for the police magistrates to hear these cases. The Government also took power to appoint two additional Commissioners, because the number of these inquiries would probably be increased, and in cases of great importance a Special Commissioner would be sent down. In doing so, however, the Government did not intend generally to supersede the local magistrates or the stipendiary magistrates, whose powers had been exercised with great advantage. In the next place, the Government took power to make rules; and their object in doing so was that rules should be in all cases strictly prescribed, so that in all inquiries held before two justices, or a stipendiary magistrate, or a Wreck Commissioner, the primary duty of the Court should be to institute a full and searching inquiry into all the causes of the disaster. The rules would also provide that if in the opinion of the officer representing the Board of Trade, or of the Judge, the circumstances disclosed were such as to incriminate any one person, then the Court should be bound to give him notice of all the charges, and afford him, by adjournment or otherwise, every opportunity of meeting the case against him. That was the explanation of the form of procedure which his right hon. Friend proposed to establish by this Bill. To show to what extent the number of inquiries had increased since it had been provided that a legal officer of the Board of Trade should attend to them, he might mention that whereas in 1865 there had been only 37 inquiries, there had been in 1875 274 inquiries, and they had every reason to believe that under the provisions of this Bill the number of inquiries would be still more increased. The hon. Member for Derby seemed to think that the Board of Trade must be remiss in its duty, because it had stopped a great number of ships as unseaworthy and had yet instituted so few prosecutions; but it was the merit of the system now in force and proposed to be continued that it stopped people from committing crime—it actually stopped ships before they were sent to sea and before there was an attempt to send them to sea. The Board of Trade might be justified in detaining a ship, and yet the owner might not come within the letter of the law as criminally guilty of sending or attempting to send the ship to sea. That morning a valuable Paper had been placed in the hands of hon. Members, and it showed clearly the difficulties with which the Board had to contend, the reasons why it had instituted so few prosecutions, and why it had been successful in still fewer cases. The various proposals relating to deck cargoes would have to be fully considered in Committee, but he should be justified in making one remark now. On several occasions the hon. Member for Derby had referred to a report made by two members of Lloyd's at the request of the Board of Trade, and laid before the Commission on Unseaworthy Ships; but the hon. Member was clearly not cognizant of another table, of exactly equal authority, because it was also prepared by Lloyds, but applied to many more ports, and extended over a longer period. It showed distinctly what the casualties were between 1840 and 1862, when the deck-loading law was in operation, and between 1862 and 1872, when it was repealed; and it was a curious fact that this Return was contradictory of the other, because it showed distinctly that the total losses had not increased and that the casualties had actually diminished. This only proved that there were varying statistics which the Royal Commissioners were unable to reconcile, though they attempted to do so; but when the House decided this matter it would do so not upon statistics, but upon arguments in favour of the Government proposal or any counter proposals which might be made. As to grain cargoes, his right hon. Friend had hardly been understood in the statement he had made, for he had fully explained how loyally he had endeavoured to carry out the intentions of Parliament. The difficulty the Department had experienced in considering the peculiar circumstances of so many ports had not been fully realized. It had to discover where surveyors ought to be appointed, where special circumstances rendered such appointments unnecessary, where the underwriters caused surveys to be made which need not be repeated, and the peculiar circumstances of isolated ports. The exceptional position of Taganrog, for instance, to which the hon. Member (Mr. Plimsoll) had alluded, occasioned difficulty, for it was found that an efficient survey there would cost £800 a-year. As regarded surveys at home the instructions were most precise; and, as it was hoped most ships would be inspected before leaving ports abroad, it was believed that such inspection would be the less necessary in all cases here. They had directed the inspection of those ships which showed a list or had met with casualties during the voyage, and, after the experience of two months at the end of the grain season, he believed this would enable them to deal satisfactorily with the question of grain cargoes. He believed the 4th clause of the Bill would not bear the construction which the hon. Member for Warwick had put upon it; it was not the intention of the Government that it should alter the law; and he believed when its terms came to be more fully criticized it would be found that it did not. While thanking the hon. Member for Derby for the careful criticisms he had passed upon the Bill, he did not wish to follow the hon. Member into the statistics relating to the loss of life at sea, because the House would not be governed by a few statistics; the introduction of the Bill proved that the Government was satisfied there was loss of life at sea, which all equally regretted, and that in some cases it had arisen from the unseaworthiness of ships; and the Bill showed that the Government desired to deal as fully as they were able with these cases. They wished to impress upon shipowners the responsibility of the business in which they were engaged, and to require them to show that in all cases they had taken reasonable pains to secure seaworthiness in the ships they sent to sea; and, therefore, it was difficult to understand how it could be said that nothing had been done for seamen. Surely the tendency of such legislation must be to increase the safety of seamen at sea? They continued the enactment of last year which gave seamen a direct means of challenging the seaworthiness of a ship, and relieved one-fourth of a crew from the necessity of finding security for costs; and the only change made was one which would affect small ships in respect of which complaints might be made by one or two drunken men. It would be hard, indeed, if a ship should be detained on such a complaint, and a proviso was inserted to guard against such cases by empowering an officer who considered that a complaint was vexatious and frivolous to require security for costs before detaining a ship. On the whole, he ventured to hope that the proposals of the Government would prove satisfactory to the House.

MR. WILSON, as representing the shipping interests of the port of Hull, desired to give the measure a general support; and, while expressing satisfaction that the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had avoided those personalities which last Session gave a tone of intimidation to his remarks, to confess regret that the hon. Member had not, by apologizing for his past errors, strengthened the sympathy of the House and the country in the cause of the merchant seamen. There was no object in legislation if it was not to protect seamen; there had been no agitation for legislation to protect shipowners, although as a class they had grievous complaints which might justify a counter agitation for their remedy. What he meant was to some extent proved by Board of Trade statistics, which showed that the tonnage—meaning both sailing ships and steamers—of Norway had increased from 640,705 tons in 1864 to 1,245,293 tons in 1874, while the steam tonnage of the United Kingdom had increased from 5,251,757 tons in 1864 to 5,681,000 in 1873—the former increase being double, and the latter only 10 per cent. By imposing restrictions on the shipowners of this country they gave decided advantages to foreign shipowners; and, therefore, instead of an increase of British tonnage, they might find foreigners coming in and taking away the carrying trade of the country. In one year the British sailing ships coming to the port of Hull amounted to 121,151 tons, while in the same year the foreign sailing ships coming to that port amounted to 364,989 tons—there were coming to Hull three tons of foreign shipping for one ton of British shipping. They must, therefore, take care on this subject not to legislate in a manner that would drive British tonnage from the seas. With regard to the 3rd clause of the Bill as to sending unseaworthy ships to sea, the objection entertained by shipowners was that it assumed a person to be guilty before he was proved to be so, whereas it had hitherto been the law to assume innocence till guilt was proved. So far as he had heard, there was no objection to Clauses 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9. In Clause 10, which gave power to one-fourth of the crew to stop a ship going to sea, there was debateable ground between shipowners and the friends of seamen. At the large meeting of the shipowners in the City the other day, an almost unanimous protest was raised against this clause; but he did not think that even that point would be seriously pressed by shipowners, because they felt it their duty to do all they could to assist the Legislature in passing a law which would put an end to agitation on the subject. With regard to grain cargoes, he could speak, not from theory, but from great personal experience, and he must say, so far as the subject had been brought before him, he considered the action of the Board of Trade had been satisfactory in the extreme. Only last Session he had considered it his duty to call attention to the long list of steamers laden with grain which had foundered in the Bay of Biscay. Since the short Act of last year had come into operation they had not had to deplore the same loss of life and property. There had also been a lamentable loss of life and property in steamers coming across the Atlantic loaded with grain, and they had not had a repetition of those losses. The same might be said of steamers coming from the Black Sea and from Mediterranean ports. That was the best practical commentary on the working of the temporary Act of last Session. The deck cargo clause raised a serious difficulty. He would at once support a measure which in any way tended to prevent deck-loading, and in his opinion the difficulty might be met by providing that, within certain limits of time, no vessel crossing the Atlantic should be allowed to carry a deck-load of any description; but it became a serious question when a proposal was made which, if carried out, would interfere with the great mass of the coasting trade of this country. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade acknowledged the difficulty, and in order to meet it he proposed to put a tax on deck cargoes by charging extra dock dues. But who would benefit by that? The dock companies were perfectly satisfied with the charges they now imposed, and these extra dues would, he feared, tend materially to lessen the dues now received, and would in that way operate injuriously upon the carrying trade of the country. There were some cargoes which could not be carried except on deck. Among these were cattle, fruit, agricultural machinery, wood from the Baltic, which were mostly carried in the summer time, and generally when the holds of the vessels were only half full. It would, therefore, be unfair to impose upon shipowners an extra charge for dock dues in such cases. With regard to a load-line, the shipowners of the port of Hull had met and decided to carry out that provision to the best of their ability. For himself, he must say it was not right that the attempt to solve a difficult question like this should be treated with ridicule or contempt. As a shipowner he had come to the conclusion, with many other practical men, that a maximum load-line should be fixed, and if on going abroad that load-line was varied, it would soon be found out who was responsible for it. Public opinion, he thought, would be strong enough to prevent any attempt to evade the law. He felt it to be his duty to give the Government every assistance in passing this Bill, which he believed would effect the object which all had in view—namely, the protection of the lives of our seamen, without acting prejudicially to the interests of our Mercantile Marine.

Mr. BENTINCK begged to endorse the comments which the hon. Gentleman who had just down had made upon the language and conduct of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll). Without any wish to be discourteous to any hon. Member, he must say that the hon. Member for Derby had upon more than one occasion been most unfortunate in his statements in this House, and had, moreover, thrown out charges broadcast against the shipowners of this country, than whom no body of men stood higher in public estimation; and, having done so, had failed either to substantiate or to retract them. With reference to this Bill, it was not his intention to enter into any discussion of its merits; but it was impossible to exaggerate its importance. Amongst the grievances put forward justly by the shipowners, one had been that they were harassed by constant legislation, and what they asked for was a permanent measure. He understood that the Government brought in that Bill as a permanent measure, and it was on that ground he wished particularly to offer a few observations. The joint object of the hon. Member for Derby and the Board of Trade was to save life at sea; but both the hon. Member for Derby and the Board of Trade were affected with what in medical parlance was called monomania. They seemed to think that the way to save life at sea was by dealing with one question only. But his right hon. Friend failed entirely to deal with the principal cause of the loss of life at sea, and if the Bill were carried in its present shape, it would perpetuate and sanction the existing state of things, which must lead annually to an enormous loss of life, for which the Government would be held responsible. We had been told that a certain place was paved with good intentions; but unless the Bill was amended, the intentions of the House of Commons would bear the same fruits as the good intentions which were said to exist in another place. He admired the talent, the energy, and the zeal which his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade had shown in handling the question; but his right hon. Friend was immensely overloaded by the multiplicity of business with which he had to deal, and that circumstance had compelled him to neglect what ought to be the most important element of a Bill on this subject. On the question of grain cargoes all were agreed; and as for deck cargoes, they ought, except in coasting vessels, to be altogether prohibited. A great deal was said about the necessity of preventing overloading. But was the House aware of the number of ships lost from underloading? A light ship was quite as dangerous as an overloaded ship, and more so, for in certain cases you could not keep her from going ashore. But there was a much more fruitful cause of loss of life than unseaworthy ships, and that was unseaworthy seamen. If the House would take the trouble to inquire into the cause of wrecks, especially those on our coasts, they would find that a very large number of wrecks were to be attributed not to unseaworthy ships, but to unseaworthy sailors—men shipped as "A.B.'s," who not only came aboard intoxicated, but were utterly unable to perform the duties which they engaged to perform. The only practical way of dealing with this serious difficulty was not to accept anyone as an A.B. who could not produce a certificate of his former service. One of the chief causes of loss of life at sea was want of discipline. Unfortunately, the magistrates, in cases which came before them, generally leaned to the men, and disorderly and mutinous conduct was thus encouraged on shipboard. The Bill ignored that subject altogether. Again, fires on board emigrant ships at sea were often caused by what on shore would be called burglary, but what was known at sea as boring through a bulkhead to get at liquor. Yet, the master of the ship had no power to deal summarily with offences of this description. Another point was the bad form of ships. In bad weather many steamers, especially those going from the East Coast ports to the Baltic, foundered, though they were well-found and well-manned, because they were so long that they were unmanageable in bad weather. That was in a great measure the fault of our tonnage laws, but the Bill did nothing to correct them. A still more grave omission was the failure to deal with the subject of collisions at sea and the blundering "rule of the road." Unless in the event of a collision, there was no legal penalty for not carrying the proper lights at night; but ought there not to be a penalty for disobeying one of the most stringent regulations of the Board of Trade? At present, the penalties were so trivial as to be practically no penalties at all. Substantially the same remark applied to the offence of keeping a bad look-out. Then there was the practice of driving steamers at full speed in fogs and at night, more especially in narrow channels, when numbers of vessels were sure to be near. In a Bill which had for its object the prevention of loss of life at sea, it was unaccountable that such matters should not be provided for, and unless they were dealt with many lives would be lost which might be saved.

MR. GOSCHEN: A remark made in the course of the debate by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) gave considerable pain to some shipowners in this House. The hon. Member for Derby referred to the cases of two shipowners—Members of this House—and said that one of them had lost 100 men in the course of 12 months, while he quoted some statistics also about the other. Now, shipowners in this House feel that a general statement of this kind, not fixed upon any individual, and one, therefore, to which it was impossible for any one of them to reply, is rather a hardship. I ventured to communicate with the hon. Member for Derby on the subject, and he, approaching the matter with fairness and in the best spirit, anxious to do nothing which should prejudice the great cause he has at heart, has authorized me to say on his behalf that, seeing that the effect of his remarks might be to fix his statements on the wrong men, he regrets having made them at all, as it is far from his desire to create prejudice by any words, unsubstantiated by specific facts, affecting the general character of shipowners in this House. I think the House will be pleased to hear this statement.

LORD ESLINGTON said, he had pleasure in congratulating the President of the Board of Trade and the House on the fact that up to the present there had been an evident desire on the part alike of hon. Members who were shipowners and of those who might be described as treating the question from a national point of view, to approach the question calmly and to discuss it without resorting to the inflammatory language which had on some occasions been used both in the House and outside its walls. He had hoped that the present Bill would be so drawn as to effect a satisfactory and permanent settlement of the question; but he could not so regard it, for the reason that it contained no proposal to consolidate the vast mass of existing law on the subject. He hoped that before the measure left the House an assurance would be given by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of it that it was the intention of the Government to deal with the matter in this sense. It was very proper to rivet upon the shipowners the full responsibility of any action on their part which might endanger the safety of ships and the possible loss of valuable lives; but he contended that before they called upon a man to obey the law they were bound to make him understand what the law was. At the present moment the laws relating to Merchant Shipping were in a state of great confusion; and unless during the present Session some attempt was made to consolidate them, the House would only be adding another statute to the already vast mass of legislation on the subject. The present Bill was, in its main clauses, a re-enacting measure, and the new provisions which it contained were such as would be accepted with gratitude and satisfaction by the great body of shipowners. Upon one point, however—namely, the constitution of the superior Court which should decide such questions as those relating to the best construction of ships or machinery—he held strongly that one of the referees should be chosen by the shipowners themselves, so that the decision upon these important points should not rest with nominees of the Board of Trade. He regretted that prominence had not been given to the subject of the training of seamen and apprentices. Every encouragement ought to be given to shipowners to carry apprentices. Compulsory apprenticeship could not, of course, be enacted; but it was clearly the duty of the Government to remove any restrictions which at present prevented the proper development of the system of apprenticeship. In his opinion, the Mercantile Marine should be placed under the control of a competent Board. He would congratulate the hon. Member for Derby on the extreme moderation of his present demands, and wished to point out that while the shipowners of this country were content to accept the main principles of the Government Bill, they would do their best to modify many of its details in Committee.

Mr. SAMUDA said, it was important to bear in mind that when they were seeking to pass a permanent measure the Government ought to accept reasonable and proper Amendments from whatsoever quarter they might come, in order that their Bill might be rendered as perfect as possible. Although he agreed with most of the proposals which it contained, there were certain of its provisions which did not in his opinion meet the altered circumstances of the case since the end of the last Session. He should desire to see a provision introduced into the Bill absolutely prohibiting the change of the name of a vessel. It was a common thing for the names of vessels of the most inferior class to be changed, notwithstanding the obstacles the regulations of the Customs and the Board of Trade placed in the way of such proceedings. The result was that the thing was so cleverly done that the public were deluded into trusting their lives in vessels, sailing under a new name, that were utterly unseaworthy. As to deck cargoes the penalty was not sufficient, they ought to be absolutely prohibited in the cases of voyages across the Atlantic, when they were found to be inconsistent with the public safety. It had been said that if all these restrictions were placed on English shipping, the result would be that the trade would be thrown into the hands of foreigners. But the question they had to determine was not as between English and foreign shipowners, but whether, in the interests of public policy, they were justified in making such laws as would tend to the destruction of property and of human life. It had been stated that night, and Returns bore out the fact, that the loss of life owing to the practice of carrying deck cargoes was five times as great since they had been allowed to be carried as it was when they were illegal. The fact was, that it was not in the interest of the nation to allow people to enter into a particular trade which resulted in loss of life. The right hon. Gentleman had made a broad statement to the effect that there was not an increasing loss of life and property at sea; but the only justification for his Bill was that there was an increase in such loss. With regard to the subject, he would remind the House that as he had stated on several occasions the Wreck Register showed in the five years ending in 1853 the total loss of ships was 969 per year, in the following five years 1,118, in the next five years 1,488, and in the last 1,748 per annum. Between 1858 and 1868 the number of ships and steamers on the British register had increased only from 27,000 to 29,000, so that whilst the increase of ships during those 10 years was 8 per cent the increase in losses was 50 per cent. During the same period the loss of life rose from 350 to 850 a-year. Everything ought to be done to restrain the carrying of goods on deck, because he believed that was a most dangerous mode of employing ships. With reference to load-line, he entirely agreed with the view of the Government, and believed compulsory classification to be unnecessary and impossible. The only load-line which it was practical to give to a ship was that load-line which the owner of the ship, acting on his own judgment, decided to be the correct line to use. His right hon. Friend proposed, very justly, to make every shipowner mark his line; but he put no penalty whatever on a non-adherence to that line. He (Mr. Samuda) thought a clause ought to be inserted in the Bill compelling a shipowner who had marked his line to pay for all losses which might result from overloading. He regretted that no mention was made in this Bill of a subject with which the Bill that was dropped last Session proposed to deal—namely, seamen's advance notes. He admitted that a great many disadvantages were connected with the system of making advances to seamen; but he also believed it was absolutely impossible to do without advances of some sort. They ought to face that subject. He fully approved of his right hon. Friend's desire to obtain a certificate of health, and he approved of the plan he had adopted for that purpose; but he feared that he would meet with a great deal of opposition. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought forward a Bill which dealt with restriction on insurance which he (Mr. Samuda) believed to be the essence of the whole question. He approved of that Bill, but he wanted it to go further, and to provide that the amount to be recovered by insurance in cases of total loss should be restricted to three-fourths of the amount insured. Such a provision would effectually ensure care on the part of shipowners, and prevent to a great extent disasters at sea. On the whole he should give the Bill his cordial support, and assist the Government in passing it as soon as possible.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY acknowledged the very encouraging spirit in which the debate had been conducted, and hoped the House would feel that the Bill itself had been framed in the same fair spirit, and with the wish to meet the very serious national evils the existence of which all admitted, their only ground of difference being as to the mode in which those evils could be dealt with most satisfactorily. That Bill was not, as one speaker had described it, a re-enactment of a hasty measure of last year; because the temporary Bill of last year, with the exception of its 1st section, for enabling the Board of Trade to delegate some of its functions to detaining officers, was taken out of the dropped Bill, which was prepared with the greatest care, and introduced with the greatest deliberation at the commencement of the Session. There had been no hurry in the composition of the present Bill, which had, in fact, had a longer period of gestation than almost any measure he knew of; while, moreover, it had had the peculiar advantage of six months' trial as an experiment to test it. There were no novelties in this Bill except two valuable additions; the one the appeal given from the judgment of the Board of Trade surveyor to a new Court constituted for the purpose, and the other, the appointment of a superior Judge for inquiries into casualties. Those two improvements had been very much derived from advice and information acquired on a circuit of some of our principal ports which he had the advantage during the Autumn of making in company with his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary of his Department, whose advent to the Board of Trade nobody more highly appreciated than he did. While on that tour as much of their time was spent in communications and discussions with the seamen of the various ports as with the ship-owners, and valuable suggestions had been equally obtained from both of those interested classes. The criticisms offered upon that Bill divided themselves into its sins of omission, and its sins of commission. The noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Elington) complained that the measure did not embrace a consolidation of the law. He thought he had given sufficient reasons against attempting this now in his introduction of this Bill; but something had been done in the way of a temporary substitute for consolidation by the preparation of a digest of the law and a copious index which rendered the law perfectly intelligible to anybody. That was, he thought, as much consolidation as he now could do. The various provisions of all the Acts on this subject were so collated as to form, practically, one consolidated Bill, with the advantage of a very elaborate table of reference. The consolidated Bill, which was thrice in vain introduced by the late Government, was not very much better, and rather larger than that to digest. However, he could not, for the reasons he had given in the previous discussion, undertake the consolidation of the whole of the law affecting Merchant Shipping at the present time. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) complained that the clauses in the Bill of last Session on the subject of the discipline of seamen had been omitted in this Bill. That was done purposely, and he thought rightly, because the existing law was not so much deficient as its exercise; and the clauses he introduced were more for the sake of methodizing than altering. His chief alterations were offering an alternative of forfeiture of wages for imprisonment; but he was blamed for intruding the subject altogether in the way of what the House was more intent upon. The hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had very naturally complained that this Bill did not embody his views in regard to a compulsory Government survey and classification of ships. Now, while complimenting that hon. Member on the moderation with which he had spoken that night, he must remark that that moderation was no doubt due to the fact that the hon. Gentleman had found himself obliged, in attempting to work out his object, to change perpetually his own proposals. The hon. Member's proposition now amounted to this—that ships which were not classed by Lloyd's or at Liverpool should be classed by the Government; and in order to do that he was compelled to ignore all the other registries and all the private clubs, and to except many of the best lines of ships which did not classify or insure at all, leaving to the Board of Trade only the ships that were, in his opinion, badly classed or too bad to class. If, then, the Board of Trade was to have nothing to do but to look after the worst class of ships which endangered life, that was really what the Department attempted now to do as a matter of police; so that they and the hon. Member came unintentionally to a common ground, only he maintained that his was the right and safe principle, and the other fraught with infinite mischief even to its ostensible object. As to the complaint of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) that the Bill did not deal with the system of advance notes, the more he thought of the subject the more he saw that it was a matter which the shipowners had in their own hands. If the advance note system led to demoralization, why did they not leave it off, as many of the best lines had already done? He hoped shipowners would see that this was a matter of private arrangement between them and their servants, in which legislation ought not to be called upon to help them. As to sins of commission in the Bill, the clause asserting it to be a misdemeanour to send an unsafe ship to sea, was accused of making men prove their innocence. It was a misconception to say that the Bill threw the onus of proof on shipowners. The fact was first proved which gave prima facie evidence of a grave crime—that of knowingly sending a ship to sea in a way to endanger life. There was then offered means of self-exculpation by a man's proving that he had used all reasonable means of safety. It was said many shipowners did not know the condition of their ships, but that was no reason why the Government should find such information for them; and there was no other trade that pleaded ignorance of the undertaking and asked Government to supply the requisite science for it. It was supposed by the hon. Member for Warwick that the 4th clause, disputing shipowners' liability to seamen, deviated from the late Act in including accidents from fellow-servants, but he would see it was not so; the wording was simplified, but the substance remained the same. The hon. Member for Stoke (Dr. Kenealy) asked when it could be justifiable to send an unsafe ship to sea, which words occurred in the Bill and in the existing law. The answer was, when a ship put into a port where she could not be repaired. The hon. Member for Derby said that the issue between them was whether ships should be allowed to go to sea that required to be repaired, and the hon. Member added—"May God defend the right!" but there was no such issue involved. It was admitted that there were ships that needed repair and that they ought to be repaired, and that overloaded ships ought not to go to sea; the only issue was as to the mode in which repair should be secured and overloading prevented. The Government proposed to throw the responsibility on those who understood their own business or ought not to undertake it, and to interfere only when life was endangered; the hon. Member proposed to cast the responsibility on the Government and to invest a Commission, consisting of retired shipowners by the side of the Board of Trade, with executive and legislative powers. Parliament would certainly not permit such a Commission to exercise legislative functions in so important a matter, nor set up a double executive by way of curing one. If the Board of Trade was to undertake unlimited responsibility and partnership in connection with the trade of the country it certainly would require to be reconstituted; but if it was to keep to its proper functions, and only to watch the interests of the public in connection with private enterprise, and see that human life was not unnecessarily endangered, it was not overworked, but was equal to all that Parliament required of it, and there was no necessity to create a second body to hold one rein while it retained the other. He entertained a confident hope that the Bill would furnish a basis for a satisfactory settlement of all the points on which the country were now intent, demanding amendment of the law for greater security of life at sea.

Mr. E. COLLINS said, he had pleasure in giving a general support to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the

President of the Board of Trade, who dealt with this difficult and delicate question in a manner acceptable to shipowners and satisfactory to the country. It was too much the practice to treat this as if it were merely a shipowners' Bill; he contended it was a question of larger public policy, affecting the more important trade interests of this country. He was not at present disposed to discuss the clauses of the Bill: if he were so disposed, his criticisms would be of a friendly character. He preferred to confine his observations to suggestions to hon. Gentlemen who professed sympathies for seamen, that they could find a large field for them if they directed their attention more to the means for elevating seamen from the wretched habits of drunkenness and disorder, to which they were perhaps more prone than any other class in the community. He regretted to have found persons throughout the country agitating the minds of sailors, and impressing them with a belief that their interests were not provided for, whilst the capitalist classes got all the benefit of legislation affecting shipping. This was not creditable to persons who could better employ themselves in advocating temperance amongst seamen, in educating them in their duties, and in other such measures as might rescue this most valuable class from degrading habits, and render them more respectable than they were. All would cheerfully admit that the hon. Member for Derby had done much to improve the condition of the sailor—he had roused public attention to this most important of our national obligations. Having now advanced the question to a position enabling it to be dealt with effectively by practical men, he ventured to believe that his patriotism and generosity which all admired would find still greater recognition if he now left the subject in the hands of Government, giving them his valuable aid in producing a really good measure. He could not sit down without expressing regret that the hon. Member for Derby had, in his speech to-night, reflected on two Members of this House, imputing to them more than mere words conveyed, when he told the House that within a period of 12 months one had lost seven ships with 100 precious lives, and the other four ships with over 28 lives. Such imputations had been before now disproved, when it was shown to the satisfaction of the House that no blame attached to the owners, since the ships had a high classification and were greatly under-insured. He appealed to the hon. Gentleman in the spirit of generosity for which he gave him credit, to withdraw irritating imputations in deference to the feeling of the House.

MR. D. JENKINS considered that the question of load-line had been satisfactorily disposed of by the Bill of last year, and expressed a hope that the Government would abolish deck cargoes, excepting with regard to certain goods which could not be carried below. He believed that the machinery provided at the various ports for the stoppage of ships reported on as unseaworthy would prove both cumbrous and ineffectual. It was absolutely essential that surveys instituted under such circumstances should be conducted by experienced persons. With respect to the compulsory survey of unclassed ships there was great difference of opinion; but many shipowners were in favour of it, and the proposal of the Government was a step in the right direction, inasmuch as it would tend to prevent disasters at sea, which was as much desired by shipowners as by any other class. He believed, on the whole, that though the Bill might be improved in Committee, it was a good Bill, and he should support the second reading.

MR. E. J. REED said, he believed that though the measure would not be a final one, it would be, to a considerable extent, a permanent one; because it showed that the Government were desirous of showing their sympathy with public opinion upon those points on which public opinion was generally made up. With respect to compulsory survey, that would one day take its place on the Statute Book, and it would be found to give less trouble to the Government, to shipowners, and be of greater advantage to the public than any course short of such an enactment. Such a thing could not be done in this Parliament, and therefore he should give the Government his most cordial support in carrying through the present measure, and would not be too exigent in regard to any Amendments which might be proposed. They were discussing a general measure, and he deprecated the complaints which had been made by hon. Members on strong expressions of the hon. Member for Derby. It was better to treat the subject as one of national importance than to impart personal considerations like that into it. Ships had exhibited very strange incidents during the Recess; and considering that the Prime Minister had uttered his little personal gibe at a former Minister, because he was a returned colonist, the hon. Member for Derby might be permitted to speak of the vessels in the way he had spoken this evening, although the hon. Member had withdrawn his statement when appealed to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London to withdraw it. One point was deserving of notice. While the representatives of shipowners in that House deprecated the interference of Government with Merchant Shipping, they, at the same time, insisted on urging upon the Government the duty of making provision for a supply of seamen to our Mercantile Navy. Why should they do that? They were no more bound to do that than to supply workmen for any other trade. All they could do was to aid shipowners in any effort they might make for that purpose. With regard to grain cargoes and the load-line, it would be possible to improve the clauses when they got into Committee; and he would venture to suggest to the Government that before the Bill went into Committee, they might select and incorporate in it such Amendments as had been placed on the Paper which they might consider to be improvements. He thought the Government had done well in concentrating attention upon a few practical leading points, instead of attempting the consolidation of all the statutes as to Merchant Shipping. Such a measure would have led to debates which could have ended, that Session, at all events, in nothing. He regarded the proposal of the Government that in the event of a quarter of the crew joining in a representation to stop a ship they would be exempt from punishment, as one which met the difficulties of the case, and he only hoped that the Government would give to the suggestions that would be made in Committee such consideration that the Bill—which was a Bill in the right direction—might become a workable, and, if possible, a final measure.

INDIAN LEGISLATION BILL.—[BILL 54.]
(Lord George Hamilton, Mr. Attorney General.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

MR. BECKETT-DENISON said, he should move certain Amendments in Committee. By the present law it was not lawful for Her Majesty to disallow law passed by the Governor General in Council, but by this Bill it was proposed to give power to Her Majesty to disallow such law or any part thereof. There were other objections to the Bill in giving power to the Governor General to pass new measures.

MR. FARLEY LEITH expressed his satisfaction that the provisions of the present Bill were different from those unconstitutional ones which were contained in the measure discussed last Session, and stated that he should also propose some Amendments in Committee to remedy what he considered to be its faults.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL much preferred the Bill which the Government had introduced last year to the measure at present before them, and he regretted that the Government had given way so much to the lawyers. He looked upon the present as an unconstitutional measure.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR strongly protested against the unprecedented and objectionable proposal to allow a Court-martial to interfere with laws that had been passed by the Government of India. It was only right that some safeguard against objectionable legislation should be provided; but the mode of doing so, as provided by this Bill, of allowing Courts for the administration of justice and Courts-martial to challenge the validity of laws duly passed by the Indian Government, at the very time those courts were assembled to try cases under such laws, appeared to be open to the gravest objection.

MR. FAWCETT thought that to bring on the Bill at 12 o'clock at night without explanation, was a significant illustration of the amount of interest taken by that House in the affairs of India. It was a fitting comment upon the views in respect to the despotic rule of India which had been expressed early in the evening. He asked the Government whether the Bill had been submitted to the Governor General and his Council and they approved of it? There were those who were most deeply interested in the affairs of India who looked with the utmost concern upon the manner in which the Governor General was controlled by telegraph from Whitehall, and he was inclined to think that that control had largely increased during the last two years.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the hon. Member who had just sat down was in error in supposing that it was intended to diminish the powers of the Governor General by this Bill; on the contrary, its object was to strengthen the hands of the Governor General. Certainly the Government of India had an objection to the Bill that it did not go far enough; but its simple object was to give to the Governor General a Parliamentary title to his legislative powers. The Bill had two objects; the first to define more clearly the duties and powers of the Governor General, and the second to provide a quick and sure method of testing whether he had exceeded those powers.

(Mr. Maurice Brooks, Mr. Butt, Mr. Ronayne.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M. BROOKS, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to assimilate the law regarding the election of high sheriffs for cities and boroughs in Ireland to that of England and Scotland. Should the Bill pass, it would simply restore to Irish corporations privileges which they formerly enjoyed, but of which they had been deprived. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Maurice Brooks.)

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS, in the absence of the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Verner), moved the rejection of the Bill. He denied that public opinion in Ireland was favourable to giving to corporations the appointment of high sheriffs or clerks of the peace; but, on the contrary, the general opinion was that these appointments should continue to be vested in the Crown.

MR. I. T. HAMILTON seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Arthur Guinness.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH appealed to the hon. Member for Dublin not to persist in his opposition to this stage of the Bill, but to allow it to pass the second reading, and to endeavour to amend anything he might consider objectionable in Committee. It would be advisable that the Committee on the Bill should be postponed for some time, in order that hon. Members might have before them the proposals which the Government intended to make for uniting the offices of Clerk of the Crown and clerk of the peace in Ireland. Should these proposals be adopted, the office of clerk of the peace in boroughs could not be dealt with as suggested in this Bill. He would therefore recommend his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. BUTT said, he had made a similar proposal with regard to Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Waterford, and Kilkenny. He did not succeed, and the Irish felt naturally dissatisfied that such a broad distinction was made between Irish and English corporations. He hoped the present Bill would be more successful.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. DISRAELI, in rising to move a Resolution with respect to Supply as the First Order of the Day, said, the result of the Resolution would be to put an end to the numerous and well-founded complaints which had been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House that they never knew when the great Estimates—more particularly those relating to the Army and Navy—were coming on for discussion. Amendments on miscellaneous subjects frequently occupied the whole evening; and hon. Members, after having attended several times, watching for an opportunity of revising or checking the great sources of public expenditure, for those services whose condition was a subject of universal interest, found the opportunity had been lost, and got weary of the disappointment and the uncertainty of the Estimates being discussed. Practically the effect of the Resolution would be that on Monday, and on Monday only, when the Committee of Supply was moved, the Speaker would leave the Chair as a matter of course, and the only Amendments which could be discussed would be those on the subject before the House respecting the Army or Navy. The Resolution had originated with the Committee on Public Business which sat in 1871, and of which he and, he believed, the noble Lord opposite were Members. It was introduced into the House modified, at the suggestion of Mr. Bouverie, a great authority on the Business of the House, who altered the last three lines. It was adopted by the then existing Government as an Order which considerably and beneficially affected the conduct of Business during the remaining years of the last Parliament. The year before last, when the present Government had the responsibility of managing the Business of the House, he did not think it necessary to make a Motion of this kind. This year, however, he wished to adopt the course which was sanctioned by the last Parliament. He was prepared for the complaints that this was an attempt to diminish the privileges of private Members. Generally speaking, he agreed that those privileges ought not to be curtailed, and he had given many instances, not only on that, but also on the other side of the House, of his sympathy with their views in this respect. At the same time the passing of the Estimates was one of the highest duties—if not the highest duty—of Parliament, and it was therefore desirable that they should be passed in a full House. He wished to put an end to that state of things, and he therefore asked the House to revert to the course which their Predecessors had adopted by accepting the Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That whenever notice has been given that Estimates will be moved in Committee of Supply, and the Committee stands as the first Order of the Day upon any day except Thursday and Friday, on which Government Orders have precedence, the Speaker shall, when the Order for the Committee has been read, forthwith leave the Chair without putting any Question, and the House shall thereupon resolve itself into such Committee, unless on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates respectively an Amendment be moved relating to the division of Estimates proposed to be considered on that day."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE represented to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that, granting the truth of a great deal of what he had said, it would not be agreeable to the great body of the House to find that a Motion of this sort, which very materially altered the relations of the Government to the House, had been carried at so late an hour at night, under these circumstances, which characterized the original introduction of the innovation in the former Parliament, when 13 Members of the present Government, including some Cabinet Ministers, voted in the minority against it, and the Tellers were the Judge Advocate General and the Under Secretary for Home Affairs. The House during the two last Sessions learned with much satisfaction that the right hon. Gentleman would not persist in the demand, and the disappointment would be proportionately great at so precipitate and high-handed a resumption of the claim. He begged to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. GOLDNEY supported the Motion, on the ground that it would be very convenient for hon. Members to know with certainty when Supply was to be taken.

MR. CHAPLIN could not see that there was any such necessity for the House making this sacrifice as the right hon. Gentleman had stated. He hoped the Government proposal would be postponed; if not, he should feel it his duty to support the Amendment.

MR. SANDFORD said, that the effect of the Resolution would be to prevent grievances being brought before that House.

Mr. Disraeli

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the Order, convenient as it was to the Government and to independent Members, was not perfect. Neither the late nor, he believed, the present Government wished to hinder Motions on going into Committee of Supply. But, under that Order, only one division could be taken on going into Committee, and thus Members would be precluded from bringing forward their views respecting the various services of the country. He thought the general feeling of the House would be consulted if the Government would undertake that Estimates should not be put down for Mondays, until an opportunity had been afforded to hon. Members who had given Notice of Motions to bring forward the subjects in which they were interested.

MR. BENTINCK was opposed to an infringement of the rights of private Members, and supported the Amendment.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT said, they were all anxious to advance the Business of the House; but as a Member of the Committee which sat on the subject in 1871, he must say that the present proposal of the Government was exactly that made by Mr. Bouverie, and was opposed by many of the Committee, but eventually carried. He had the same objection to it now as he had then, and he thought a fair compromise would be—which he hoped his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would accept—that only matters relating to the Estimates set down for discussion should be brought forward.

MR. DISRAELI thought the difficulty that had been suggested would be obviated by omitting the word "first," before "Order of the Day."

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

The House divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 136: Majority 92.

Question again proposed.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, speaking seated, said, he was informed that the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) had brought forward a Motion and had himself voted against it. He appealed to the Speaker to say whether that was in Order?

MR. SPEAKER said, that if, when the Question was put, the hon. Member for Cambridge University gave his vote as he gave his voice, he was in Order.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY proposed to amend the Resolution by leaving out the word "first."

Amendment proposed, in line 7, to leave out the word "first."—(Mr. Secretary Hardy.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE explained that, a suggestion having been made from the Treasury Bench before the division, which considerably modified the Resolution, he had acted on the principle that half a loaf was better than no bread. The omission of the word "first" made it a very different state of things from that which had been forced on the House by the late Government. Their plan only enabled three Motions to be made on Supply Mondays through the entire Session. As it was proposed now, on every Monday of the Session, when Supply was brought forward, opportunity was also given for a grievance being brought forward germane to the particular Supply which stood on the Paper. By a little management, and by reserving military, naval, and Civil Service questions for these days, and allowing other matters to be brought on upon Tuesdays and Fridays, private Members would find themselves very fairly provided with legitimate opportunities for raising needful questions.

MR. DISRAELI said, that the effect of the Resolution, if agreed to, would be to prevent morning sittings as much as possible; and it was at the beginning of the Session that its true value could be best appreciated.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That whenever notice has been given that Estimates will be moved in Committee of Supply, and the Committee stands as the first Order of the Day upon any day except Thursday and Friday, on which Government Orders have precedence, the Speaker shall, when the Order for the Committee has been read, forthwith leave the Chair without putting any Question, and the House shall thereupon resolve itself into such Committee, unless on going into Committee on the Army, Navy, or Civil Service

Estimates respectively an Amendment be moved relating to the division of Estimates proposed to be considered on that day.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Bill to provide for the better arrangement of Divided Parishes and other Local Areas, and to make sundry amendments in the Law relating to the Relief of the Poor in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH and Mr. SALT.

MARRIAGES (SAINT JAMES, BUXTON) BILL.

On Motion of Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, Bill to render valid Marriages heretofore solemnised in the Chapel of Ease of Saint James, in the parish of Buxton, in the county of Derby, ordered to be brought in by Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON and Mr. Secretary CROSS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 79.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 18th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Crossed Cheques (12).

PRIVATE BILLS.

Ordered, That this House will not receive any petition for a Private Bill after Friday the 17th day of March next, unless such Private Bill shall have been approved by the Court of Chancery; nor any petition for a Private Bill approved by the Court of Chancery after Thursday the 4th day of May next:

That this House will not receive any report from the Judges upon petitions presented to this House for Private Bills after Thursday the 4th day of May next.

CROSSED CHEQUES BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in presenting a Bill for amending the Law relating to Crossed Cheques, said, he thought he would best consult the convenience of their Lordships by reserving an explanation of the provisions of the Bill till it was in print. The subject was a technical one, and therefore any remarks of his by way of explanation would come better on the second reading.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON rose to call attention to the contemplated abolition of the Home Circuit, and to ask, What were the intentions of the Government with respect to the Surrey Assizes? Under the Act of 1875, which empowered the Queen by an Order in Council to alter the arrangement of the Circuits, a rearrangement had taken place, the practical result of which was—Hertfordshire, Kent, and Sussex had been joined to the Norfolk Circuit, and the Home Circuit was no more. Having had the honour of being for some years a member of that Circuit, he could not but look with regret to the severance of old ties and old associations, which the separation must occasion—nor could he forget how many men of learning and intelligence that Circuit had contributed to the Bar and the Bench. He could see no grounds whatever for the abolition. Moreover, an apprehension had existed since the charge of Baron Bramwell at Guildford, that the Surrey Assizes were to be hereafter held at Newington—a change which could not but be attended with great inconvenience to the jurors. The feeling of the county, of the assize towns, and of the Bar, was adverse to the change. He begged to ask his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack what were the intentions of the Government with respect to the Surrey Assizes?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he could not help feeling very well satisfied that his noble Friend had introduced the subject to their Lordships' attention, because when a person so observant and usually so well informed as his noble Friend laboured under such misconceptions as to what was proposed, it was in the last degree likely that misconception of the same kind would be spreading unduly over the county of Surrey. As a well-remembered and respected member of the Home Circuit his noble Friend was entitled to speak of the rending of old ties and old associations which would be caused by the new arrangements made with respect to that Circuit. Of course, a change as to a Circuit must prove inconvenient in some respects to members of that particular Circuit; but time and circumstances would demand that changes should be made in Circuits, as well as in most other things. In truth, the noble Lord himself was an example of what had been done in respect of the county of Surrey. His noble Friend was a Member of the Legislature last year, and, therefore, shared the responsibility for the Act passed last Session, in which it was provided that, by Order in Council, Her Majesty might provide for the formation, or alteration, or entire discontinuance of a Circuit. The Judicature Act had rendered a change in the Circuits absolutely necessary, with a view to overcome the pressure of business in particular places and to economize judicial time. Now, putting aside Surrey, the change in respect of the Home Circuit was only one in name. As Surrey was to be dealt separately with, manifestly the other counties which with it had composed the Home Circuit would not have been sufficient to constitute a Circuit. Accordingly it became necessary to join what remained of the Home Circuit to another Circuit, and the only Circuit to which it could be joined was the Norfolk Circuit; but in order that the newly-constituted Circuit should not be too large it, was necessary to take some counties from the Norfolk and add them on to the Midland Circuit. Then came the question, by what name the consolidated Circuit should be called. He had no prejudice in the matter. He was anxious to do what would be most agreeable to all parties concerned, and he put himself in communication with the Judges. There was no difference of opinion between those learned personages, and he heard no remonstrance from any one when it was proposed to change the name. Suppose the Circuit as now formed was called the Norfolk Circuit, there could be very little doubt that objection would be made by Kent and Sussex. On the other hand, what would the county of Norfolk say to having it called the Home Circuit? In the North, where a slice was taken off the Northern Circuit, a new name, "the North-Eastern," was given to the newly formed Circuit. A similar course was adopted when the name "South-Eastern" was substituted for "the Home" and "the Norfolk." He should have been very glad if both could have been preserved, but it would have been impossible to preserve either without causing some dissatisfaction. As regarded the question of Surrey, that was one not of form, but of substance; but on the part of the Government there had been no intention to abolish the Assizes for that county. The Act of last year gave Her Majesty in Council the power to issue Commissions for the trial of criminals and civil business in places which did not form a portion of a Circuit. What had happened in the case of Surrey was this—The time for the Nisi Prius sittings in London and Middlesex was very limited as compared with the number of London and Middlesex cases to be tried. Suitors, rather than have them postponed for an indefinite time, took them to the county of Surrey. The consequence was that at the Surrey Assizes there always appeared to be a good crop of civil business—and so there was; but it was not Surrey business, but business properly belonging to London and Middlesex. While the Assizes in other counties lasted two or three days, those in Surrey lasted weeks, and London solicitors and London witnesses went down to Croydon, Guildford, or Kingston to attend the hearing of cases which ought never to have left the metropolis. The grievance of such a state of things had frequently been pointed out; and by the arrangements under the Judicature Act for continuance sittings of Nisi Prius Courts in London and Middlesex, its continuance was rendered unnecessary. All that remained to be done was to make provision for the discharge of the Surrey business proper. It was determined that a Commission should issue for that county, and that two of the Judges who had remained in London when the others went out on Circuit should go to Guildford or Croydon or Kingston and hold sittings of Oyer and Terminer and Nisi Prius. The Commission was already issued for the Spring Assizes, which would be held by the Lord Chief Justice of England and another learned Judge. His noble Friend (Viscount Midleton) had spoken of the feeling of the County of Surrey. He (the Lord Chancellor) would read an extract of a memorial addressed to the Privy Council last year by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the borough of Guildford. It was in these terms—

"Your memorialists believe that by a proper re-arrangement of the sittings in London and Middlesex and by confining the Assizes in Surrey to the trial of cases belonging properly to the county, any inconvenience at present sustained by the Bench, the Bar, or the public may be duly met, without the ancient rights and privileges enjoyed by the county of Surrey and borough of Guildford being taken away."

What was there prayed for was just what had been done. As to the proposition to have the Assizes for Surrey held at Newington, no such proposition had been put forward by the Government, and the Commission for the Spring Assizes would go to one of the boroughs in which the Assizes were usually held. To show, however, that the county of Surrey was not quite unanimous on this point, he might mention that a representation in favour of holding the Assizes at Newington had been made. In that representation it was urged that the greater number of the prisoners to be tried at the Assizes were confined at Newington. That might be so; but as the Government had not proposed such a change he did not feel it necessary to follow his noble Friend into his arguments on that point. He trusted he had given a sufficient explanation of the measures which had been adopted with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON was sure the statement of his noble and learned Friend would be very satisfactory to the county of Surrey.

House adjourned at quarter before Six o'clock, till Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 18th February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Class II.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading —
Medical Practitioners (Ireland) * [81]; Grand Jury Laws (Ireland) * [80]; Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) * [82].

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Quain, one of the Judges selected, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the Borough of Horsham. And the same was read, and ordered to lie on the Table of this House.

ROADS (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

LORD DALKEITH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he intends to introduce a Road Bill for Scotland this Session?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that it was the intention of the Lord Advocate to introduce such a Bill as early as it was convenient to do so.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS—ADMISSION OF REPORTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as stated in the legal journals, that Her Majesty's Judges have passed a resolution to the effect that reporters shall not be admitted to hear and report the decisions upon the matters disposed of at the Judges Chambers in Serjeants' Inn; whether any reason has been assigned for that proceeding; and, whether the Government will take any steps in the matter to prevent the exclusion of reporters from the Judges Chambers?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that having consulted the learned Judges on the subject referred to in the hon. and learned Gentleman's Question, he had received a letter from Mr. Justice Lush, in answer to his inquiry, to this effect—That it was a matter of common knowledge with the profession that the rooms in which Judges sat in Serjeants' Inn were not, and never had been, open to the public. There was no accommodation in them, and none could be provided there, for the reporters; but it was quite true that in the early part of November, when the Judicature Act first came into operation, an application was made to Mr. Justice Lush, as the Judge then sitting in Chambers, to allow a reporter to attend in order to furnish for one of the law papers notes of the decisions under the new Act. Mr. Justice Lush went on to say that he thought the occasion was so exceptional, and that the publication of the early cases upon points of practice would be so beneficial to the profession, as to justify him in departing from the established usage for the time; and some arrangements were made for one gentleman of the Press to be admitted, on condition that he supplied others with the reports. The arrangement was considered as temporary and exceptional, and not to be taken as a precedent for the future. At a meeting of the Judges, which had been recently held, it was considered that the Judicature Act had been long enough in operation to make any further reports unnecessary, and they therefore reverted to the original practice. The matter was one entirely in the discretion of the learned Judges, and in which he could not interfere.

JUDICATURE ACTS—JURYMEN.

QUESTION.

MR. LOPES asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, having regard to the increased and increasing burdens imposed upon jurymen by the Judicature Acts, Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce a measure this Session for the amendment of the jury system; and, whether such measure will contain the provisions of a Bill introduced in the Session of 1874, which passed through Committee, and was approved of by this House?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, a Bill had been prepared by Her Majesty's Government, and would be introduced as soon as possible, having due regard to the state of Public Business and the prospects of its passing into law. It would contain the principal provisions of the Bill introduced in 1874.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870—SCHOOL BOARD PROSECUTIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. BOORD asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been directed to the following case, which was heard at the Greenwich Police Court on the 8th instant:—

"John Speer was summoned for neglecting to pay a School Board fine of 6*d.* and 2*s.* costs, imposed for not sending his son to school. The defendant, who was nearly blind, in a very feeble state of health, and unable to work, stated that it was quite out of his power to pay the amount. His wife, who assisted to support the family, had just been confined. He had two other children, and that morning the whole family had only a pound of bread and a penny-worth of tea and sugar for breakfast between them. He was committed for five days to Horsemonger Lane Gaol ;”

and, whether, in view of the frequent occurrence of cases involving great hardship, he is prepared to make any suggestion whereby the operation of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, may be rendered less oppressive to the poor?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I am, of course, aware of the statement to which my hon. Friend calls my attention. But as I mentioned to my hon. Friend last week, I have no means of investigating the circumstances of the cases occurring under the compulsory bye-laws of the school boards; nor have I any authority to interfere with the school boards or magistrates in the execution of the difficult duties imposed upon them by Parliament under the Act of 1870, when they have passed compulsory bye-laws. Sir Charles Reed, however, has written to offer me all the information which he possesses on the subject, and I must say that the statement which he has sent appears to me, as far as it goes, to alter considerably the aspect of this case from that which appears in the paragraph to which my hon. Friend alludes; and he has also sent a letter from the magistrate who tried the case. The statement, however, is necessarily so long that it would be impossible for me to trouble the House with it in answer to a Question. I will, therefore, show it to my hon. Friend, and if he desires, I shall be happy to place it upon the Table of the House. I hope my hon. Friend will not think that I do not share his most natural feelings of pain at the hardships which must, I fear, necessarily arise in dealing with the great evils which the Act of 1870 endeavours to meet; but I am bound to say that, as far as my information goes, I think there has been a great deal of exaggeration in these matters.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought it would be well that the statement should be laid on the Table.

CRIMINAL LAW—AGGRAVATED ASSAULTS ON WOMEN.—QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, if there is time, the Government will bring in a Bill, similar to that of last Session, for the protection of women, &c. from Aggravated Assaults?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had been requested to postpone the further inquiries which he had to make until after the Spring Assizes, when no doubt he would receive the replies of the learned Judges.

NAVY—WIDOWS OF SEAMEN AND MARINES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has examined the amended proposal for the formation of a Fund for making provision for the Widows of the Seamen and Marines of the Fleet; and, whether he will recommend the Government to assist the scheme by an annual grant; or, if he will state to the House the position in which the matter now stands?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he had referred the amended proposal to the Accountant General of the Navy; but that, in consequence of the pressure in the Department occasioned by the preparation of the Estimates, the Report had not yet been made, and therefore he was unable at present to make any statement on the subject.

ARMY—PROMOTION IN THE ORDNANCE CORPS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR BEAUMONT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the promotion of the Officers of the Ordnance Corps is under the consideration of the Royal Commission now sitting on Army Promotion; and, in the case of those Officers of Artillery and Engineers whose promotion has been lost owing to Lord Cardwell's arrangement of 1872 not having been acted on since 1874, whether the promotion so lost will be made good to them?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had reason to believe that the subject of promotion of the officers of the Ordnance Corps was under the consideration of the Royal Commission now sitting on Army Promotion. He did not understand that any engagement had been entered into with the officers of Artillery and Engineers which had been broken, although no doubt the proposal of 1872 in reference to promotion had not been carried out. Before anything was done in the matter it would be necessary to wait until the Report of the Commission was received.

GRAND JURY SYSTEM (IRELAND)— LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. MOORE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends to introduce a Bill this Session dealing with the Grand Jury System in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I expressed more than once last year my hope of being able to introduce a Bill on this subject, and towards the end of the Session I sketched out the lines upon which, as it appeared to me, the reform of the Grand Jury Laws should proceed. My views did not receive the approval of hon. Members opposite; but I still hope to propose legislation with regard to this matter. Whether, however, I shall be able to do so in the present year must depend on the progress of measures dealing with other matters of importance in Ireland, which have appeared to the Government to be of a more pressing character than Grand Jury reform. I cannot think that any useful purpose would be served by the introduction of a Bill without some hope of proceeding with it within a reasonable time.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870— SCHOOL BOARD SCHOOLS—RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is true, as alleged in the "Pall Mall Gazette" of the 2nd instant, that there is reason to believe the practice was observed until recently in certain localities of giving instruction in the Church of England catechism in School Board Schools; and, if so, whether he will state to the House in how many cases the returns reported such instruction was given in Board Schools, and what course the Educational Department has taken in regard to those cases?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, when the replies were received last year to the Return respecting religious instruction in board schools, moved for by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, it was found that in the case of five board schools instruction was being given in the Church Catechism. None of these schools had been inspected since the date when they came under the control of the board, so that the time-tables had not been seen or approved by Her Majesty's Inspectors. Four of them had been previously Church schools, and were either temporarily occupied by the board, or were in course of being transferred to the board. Only one was a new school provided by a school board. A letter was at once, as a matter of course, addressed to the school boards, pointing out that Section 14 (2) of the Act was being violated by the provisions made for religious instruction, and stating that it would be the duty of the Department to declare the boards to be in default, unless the time-tables of their schools were at once brought into conformity with the requirements of the Act as to the admission of the Church Catechism. In every case the necessary alteration was at once made.

PATENT LAWS—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to re-introduce, during the present Session, the Bill of last year on the Patent Laws?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, he intended to do so, with some modifications on matters of detail.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the third section of the recent Order in Council applicable to the Civil Service, wherein it is stated that such situations in that service as are not suitable to be filled by members of the lower division are excluded from that Order, and shall, until Her Majesty's pleasure shall be further declared, be regulated, as now, by the heads of Departments to which they belong, Whether it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government forthwith to deal with the other recommendations of the "Play-fair Commission" as regards the higher division, which so materially concerns the interests of the present members of the Civil Service?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government at present to issue any further Orders in Council with regard to the Civil Service. He would point out to his hon. Friend that the "Playfair Commission" to which he referred proposed a system applicable to the whole of the Service; but the Commissioners pointed out that the gist of their recommendations was the substitution of a large number of clerks of the lower division for the clerks of the higher division. They said that unless that could be accomplished they could not consider themselves justified, on account of the increased expenditure which would be entailed on the Government, in submitting their plans. Of course, it was impossible to adapt their plans by a stroke to the whole of the Service; and all that could be done at present was that which the Treasury had done—that was, to prepare a constitution of the lower division, and look to the gradual increase of the lower division which would take the place of a certain number of those who were unnecessarily employed in the higher division. At the same time this was a matter which would be dealt with in the several Departments; and if any Department made proposals for bringing the scheme into operation in that Department, and accompanied such proposals with a plan for re-organization, and, of course, reduction of the higher staff, the Treasury would be prepared to co-operate with the Department in such re-organization.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE BILLS— REFEREES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. ANDERSON, in rising "to call the attention of the House to the position of those officers of the House called 'Referees,' and to move for a Committee to inquire and report on that position, and particularly as to the legality and expediency of allowing 'Referees' the same power of voting on a Private Bill Committee as a Member of Parliament regularly elected by a constituency," said: In bringing before the House what appears to me an important constitutional question, I shall endeavour to do so without unduly trespassing on the time of the House. It may perhaps be asked why I should now call in question a decision of the House which was come to eight years ago, which was discussed at the time by hon. Members of far greater experience than myself, and which for those eight years has remained unquestioned. My reply is that the point which I wish to bring before the House appears to have been entirely unnoticed in the debates of that day; that it has never been called in question since, because the number of hon. Members who seem to be aware that these Referees were exercising a power of voting has been but small—and that in an institution whose powers and privileges are the growth of ages, eight years are by no means enough to create immunity from question. It was only near the end of last Session that I myself became aware that any one not an actual Member of this House had a vote in any stage of our legislation. I derived the information through finding that the vote of a Referee had decided the fate of two important local Bills in a way which I, with far better knowledge of the locality, considered illogical and absurd. Desiring to dispute the decision in this House on the third reading, I found that the actual decision had been given by one who could not come into this House to explain or justify what he had done. I thought that a most extraordinary and improper state of matters, and immediately set about inquiring how it should be so. I asked several old Members, but they knew nothing of it; in fact, did not believe it could be so at all. They had never heard of Referees voting. I then had recourse to Sir Erskine May's most valuable book, to the Standing Orders, and to the Journals of the House, and discovered that it was a thing of quite recent origin—that the power of a Referee to sit on a Committee had been conferred by a simple Resolution of this House only in 1868, and that the Resolution did not specify any power of voting. In the meantime I had failed in getting the House to upset the decision of its Committee, for the House hardly will do that in any case at all; and the consequence was, that a most unjust Bill had been passed through this House, nominally by the House itself, but really and practically by the vote of an outsider elected by no constituency, responsible to no constituency, not even responsible to this House—in fact, an utterly irresponsible individual, not even able to come into this House to explain his reasons. In this case fortunately, we had a House of Lords, and the blunder of this House was rectified there. I have said that the Resolution which enabled a Referee to sit on a Committee had not specified any power of voting. I may also say that in the whole debate the only trace that such a power was contemplated is in its incidental mention by the noble Lord at that time Member for the East Riding of Yorkshire (Lord Hotham), but alluded to by no other speaker, and it seems therefore very much open to doubt if the House really intended to confer voting power. But the point I wish to press is that, even if the House did intend to do it, it was unconstitutional and ultra vires to make such a change in the process of legislation by a mere Resolution, or in any other way than by an Act of Parliament; and it does seem to me to be a most unfortunate thing that the Resolution did not specify fully its whole scope, for in that case I think its unconstitutional character would have been detected at the time, instead of remaining till now, when it can be set right only by an acknowledgment of error, which the House, and especially the official element in the House, will be most unwilling to make. At the time when this error was committed, the Private Bill legislation of the House was in a state of great difficulty. The burden of that legislation was pressing heavily on Members, and it was urgently required that some means should be found of getting through that business more easily. In 1864 a Court of Referees had been established to examine the engineering and estimates of certain Bills, and to report on these to the Committees. That had been found to work well, in so far that their technical advice was a manifest aid to the Committees, but it was also found that in considering these details a large part of the evidence on the subject of the Bill had to be gone over before that Court of Referees, and afterwards be repeated before the Committee, and that this double evidence led to an extra expense, which it was thought might be saved. For that purpose it was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman now the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson), then Chairman of Ways and Means, that the Committee of Selection might, if they pleased, refer any Bill entirely to the Court of Referees, which, I may mention, consists of the Chairman of Ways and Means along with three other persons appointed by the Speaker, and not necessarily Members of the House. That course was objected to by the House, and particularly by Lord Hotham, then Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, who gave strong reasons against such an arrangement, one of which was that when such a Court reported to the House, and hon. Members wished to question that decision, these Referees were unable to appear here to defend their decision. Lord Hotham then proposed the following Resolution:—

which was assented to by the House, and is the Resolution which I wish to call in question. It does seem strange that Lord Hotham did not observe that the very argument which he had used with such effect against the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means—namely, that a Referee could not appear in this House to justify a decision—applied also to his own proposal, though not quite in the same degree; and that is specially so if the Resolution was intended to confer voting power, and the House will understand that it is only to the voting power that I make objection. I can understand it to be a suitable enough arrangement that the Referees should attend the Committees as assessors or advisers to give the Committee the benefit of technical knowledge on those points of engineering and estimates which, as Referees, they were specially appointed to examine; but if the Resolution meant to go further than that it was wrong. Now, whatever the Resolution meant to do, the power of voting certainly has been assumed by the Referees, and I will now lay before the House the grounds on which I think it was unconstitutional. Every hon. Member is aware that the powers and privileges of this House were in old times far more the growth of custom and precedent than of statute, and therefore it is not possible for me to adduce any statute prescribing the legislative process of passing Bills through Parliament. Here, however, is an extract from Sir Erskine May's work—

"The Imperial Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, is composed of the King or Queen, and three Estates of the Realm—viz., the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons. These several powers collectively make laws that are binding upon the subjects of the British Empire."

Here we have the legislative function clearly restricted to the Monarch and the three Estates of the Realm. They are to make the laws. Now, surely it cannot be contended that the making of a law consists merely in the final passing of it; but it consists of certain well-known stages through which every Act of Parliament, whether Public or Private, has to pass, and every one of which stages was, up to the passing of that Resolution, strictly limited to the Monarch and the Estates of the Realm. I presume an attempt will be made to show that a Private Bill is different from a Public Bill; but I do not think that, as regards legislative process, that distinction can be maintained, and for this among other reasons, that no one can draw a definite and distinct line between the two classes of Bills. We speak of Public Bills and of Private Bills, and of Hybrid Bills, but the difference cannot be strictly defined, for it may even happen that two Bills might be identical in their subject and in their provisions, and if one of them applies to London, to Edinburgh, or to Dublin, it would be a Public Bill; while, if its duplicate applied only to Manchester, to Glasgow, or to Belfast, it would be a Private Bill. Nor is there any material difference in the stages through which the two classes have to pass. Each must be introduced under the endorsement of two Members. Each must be read a first time, each must be read a second time, each must be gone through by Committee, clause by clause, each must be reported to the House, and each must be read a third time and passed; and I repeat that, till the passing of this unfortunate Resolution, every one of these stages in this House was strictly confined to Members of the House. The only difference that has existed has been the very slight one that the Public Bill is discussed clause by clause by the House in Committee, while the Private Bill is discussed clause by clause by a Committee of the House; but whether by the House in Committee or by a Committee of the House, the stage is one of the necessary stages in the making of a law, and is therefore part of the legislative function which cannot be exercised by any one other than those on whom the Constitution has imposed it. The only argument I have heard in justification is that the decision of the Committee and Referee is, not final; that the Bill has to be reported to the House, and the House can reverse the decision, but the reply to that is that practically the decision is final, because the House hardly will consider the merits of such a Bill but simply confirms its Committee; but more than that, the very same argument applies to a Bill which is discussed by the House in Committee. That also only reports to the House, yet I hardly think any hon. Member would be found to maintain that it would be open to the House, if it chose, to bring in outsiders to walk through our Division Lobbies, and give votes on the clauses of a Bill on an equal footing with ourselves merely on the pretence that the stage was not final, and would still come under review of the House. It seems to me that if the House claims a right to confer a legislative vote on anyone outside the House by any other means than by Act of Parliament, it is assuming to itself a new prerogative, and one for which there is no precedent. Now, I find that in 1704 the House of Lords, at a Conference with the House of Commons, communicated the following Resolution:—

"That neither House of Parliament hath any power, by any Vote, or Declaration, to create to themselves any new privilege that is not warranted by the known laws and customs of Parliament."—[Parl. Hist. vi. 387.]

That Resolution was assented to by the Commons, and was always acted upon. It is for those who defend the Resolution of 1868 to show that it is not a new privilege to confer legislative votes on men not elected by any constituency, not responsible to any one, and who cannot appear in the House to justify their vote. I do not ask the House to come to any hasty decision; I do not ask the House to accept my statement of the case; all I ask is that they should appoint a Select Committee of their own Members to investigate the matter. I earnestly hope that the Committee may be granted, for I see possibility of grave difficulty if it be refused. It may lead to the loss of public confidence in the decisions of such Committees. It might lead to the decision of such a Committee being disputed in the Court of Queen's Bench, and I think it would hardly consist with the dignity of this House that such an issue should be raised at all. It would be far better for the House to investigate the matter for itself, and even, if necessary, retrace a wrong step of its own free will than have its authority questioned elsewhere. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. FORSYTH, in seconding the Motion, said, he believed that it raised an important constitutional question. He did not believe that it ever was the intention of Parliament to transfer its voting powers to the Referees. How did the matter work? The Chairman of a Select Committee had a casting vote, and when there were three other Members of the Committee, including the Referee, the Chairman and the Referee could arrive at and make effective a decision which was against the views of two hon. Members of the House, that decision being practically carried not by the vote of a Member of the House, but by the vote of a Referee. In the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council there were sometimes three assessors, who took full part in the discussion, suggested points, and heard arguments, but in the decision itself they had no voice at all. He thought it would be a mistake to have a portion of the legislation of Parliament decided by the votes of those who were not Members.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire and report on the position of the Referees of the House on Private Bills, and particularly as to the legality and expediency of allowing the Referees the same power of voting on a Private Bill Committee as a Member of Parliament regularly elected by a constituency,"—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. RODWELL trusted the House would not think him guilty of presump-

tion in rising at that time; but he thought he should be almost guilty of disrespect to the House if, after his experience of Parliamentary Private Bill Committees, he did not give the House the benefit of his knowledge. It seemed to him that no solid and real ground had been laid why the system, which had worked well for a considerable number of years, should be destroyed. Some gross miscarriage of justice, or something worse, should have happened to induce the House to interfere with a state of things which had given satisfaction to the public and to those concerned with Private Bill legislation. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had erred in two respects; he had in one respect exaggerated the importance of the functions of these Referees, while he had in some degree underrated their position. These Referees were officers of the House. But they were also something more. A series of Resolutions and Standing Orders had been passed which gave them a certain status, and their position might be said to have been determined in 1867 by an Act which positively clothed them with the same powers in dealing with Private Bills, under certain circumstances, as Committees of the House. Then the hon. Member had overrated the powers of the Referees in assuming that they or the Committees had the power of deciding the fate of Bills. It was useless to disguise the fact that, in a great many cases, the verdict of the Committee was accepted by the House; but, properly speaking, the Committee's function was to report, and if it appeared that they had omitted to take some important evidence, it was possible to have the Bill re-committed, and the whole subject re-discussed. Therefore, although the Referees had a voice in Committees, it could not be said that they could walk into the House and influence the final determination of Bills. He thought the hon. Member would have taken notice of the Referee as to the question of locus standi. The system which had been adopted, by avoiding hap-hazard or conflicting decisions, had saved an enormous amount of time, and an enormous amount of money; but if the Referee were to have no vote, it would materially change the usefulness of the tribunal. The whole course of proceeding had been reduced to a system, and had worked admirably;

but as he had said, if the Referrees were not to have votes their usefulness would be very much diminished, for the House could hardly confer upon the Referrees functions in one case which were to be denied in the other. The question had undergone discussion in 1864, 1865, and 1867, and his experience showed him that the Referrees had been a very useful body. He did not know the merits of the particular case to which the hon. Member referred, but was that case, which was the only one of the kind the House had ever heard of, a sufficient ground for granting a Committee to inquire into the general practice on this question, a practice which had continued for so many years? He trusted the Committee would not be granted, as he did not think it would do any good. Another thing, it was not required, for no grievance had been made out.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that probably his experience of these matters was more remote than that of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell), and therefore he might be excused if he could not join in the conclusion his hon. Friend had arrived at. The question raised by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) was a new one, and one of such importance that it was desirable it should be settled. If it were a question as to whether the Referrees formed a good tribunal, or the element of one, he should be disposed to vote against them; but the point raised was not that—it was much more serious, and one which called for the attention of the House and Her Majesty's Government, and he therefore hoped they would state their opinion on the subject. The more highly the House valued their privileges, the more careful they should be to guard their integrity, and to inquire into the operation of any system by which they might possibly be impaired. The hon. Member for Glasgow had pointed out that the functions attributed to the Referrees were a delegation of the functions belonging to that House, and which functions were being performed by gentlemen who were not Members of the House. Now that was a very serious matter, and they had to consider whether they could delegate such powers merely by Resolution. If it was a good thing to do, then let it be done in the proper way; and he was disposed to agree that it ought to be done by Act of Parliament, because he doubted very much whether that House had the power by Resolution to delegate to those who were not Members any portion of its functions. Supposing by Resolution the House had determined that one of the Judges of the land should sit upon Election Committees, and determine the seat of a Member of that House. He thought every man would agree with him that that would be an unconstitutional Resolution, and that they would have no power to pass it. No doubt the House had thought fit to make the Judges try the Election Petitions, but it was not done by Resolution. There was nothing about which they ought to be more careful than a matter of the kind. He had no doubt his hon. and learned Friend had truly stated the efficiency of the Referrees; but however satisfactory the tribunal might be, however high the character of its members, it appeared that it was now formed by a species of Constitutional lapse, which could not be too soon remedied. The Report of a Select Committee might, therefore, be useful in placing the whole matter on a sound and Constitutional basis.

MR. STAVELEY HILL completely agreed with the observations just made. This was a matter involving Constitutional principles, and he was quite sure that House had no power to delegate its functions to gentlemen who were not Members of the House, because, if they had the power, it might be used in such a way as to lead to serious consequences. The maxim Delegatus non pro-dest delegare applied to all their legislative powers, nor was there any difference between Public and Private Bills. The Act of 1867 largely extended the powers of the Referrees in respect of locus standi and other matters; but the Standing Order which put the Referee upon the Committee was not passed until the Session of 1868, and it might be desirable to have evidence as to the manner in which the tribunal thus constituted had actually worked. He was of opinion that the question had been very properly brought before the House, and the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) deserved their thanks for the action he had taken.

MR. A. MILLS said, that the question was no less than this—whether the Business of the House should be continued to be discharged by Members of the House alone. It seemed to him a remarkable proceeding that gentlemen who were not Members should be authorized to vote upon Committees; and that merely by a Resolution. Had a Referee been appointed upon a Committee of which he was Chairman, he should have felt it his duty to report that matter to the House; and he now hoped that the House would not refuse to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject. It would tend to impeach the authority of the Private Bill Committees of the House if it was known that matters involving millions of money were to be settled by two Members of Parliament and that another who was not a Member of Parliament should have a casting vote. He should certainly support the Motion.

MR. RAIKES said, the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) was one which dealt with the question from two points of view; because the Committee he was so anxious to have appointed was to inquire into the legality as well as the expediency of allowing Referees the same power of voting in Private Bill Committees as Members of Parliament. He thought there was rather a tendency to confuse these two issues, which were quite separate in their character. He would endeavour to give a sketch of the history of the tribunal of Referees, and to show how the present system, which he admitted was an anomalous one, had come to exist. The first step was taken in 1864, when it was referred to a Select Committee to consider whether it was desirable to appoint Referees for particular purposes. The Motion was made by a Member of very great authority, the present Lord Winmarleigh, (then Colonel Wilson-Patten), and the Committee reported that it was desirable that such a tribunal should be constituted, and should have cognizance not merely of matters of engineering and finance, but also of other matters having reference to four classes of Private Bills. The tribunal was really set up as a tribunal of experts, to relieve Members of the House of duties which in many cases they were scarcely adequate to perform. At the end of 1865 a further Committee was appointed, to consider how that tribunal had worked, and that Committee reported in favour of rather extending the powers of the Referees. In 1867 a rather considerable addition was made to the powers of the Referees, because power was given to the Committee of Selection to refer Bills to Referees instead of to a Committee of the House of Commons. This reference, however, was confined to Gas and Water Bills. In 1868 the then Chairman of Ways and Means brought forward a proposition that still further extended the powers of the Referees, by allowing them a jurisdiction over all Private Bills, and not merely Gas and Water Bills. The House hesitated to give them such an extended power, and an Amendment was moved by the noble Lord the Member for the East Riding of Yorkshire (Lord Hotham), the Chairman of the Committee upon Standing Orders, to get rid of the double inquiry which had existed by the amalgamation of the two tribunals which had up to that time exercised a divided authority. It was accordingly provided by the Standing Orders that a Bill might be referred to a Committee of four Members of the House, or to a Committee of four Members and a Referee. There must, however, be four Members of Parliament on a Committee where there was a Referee. Notwithstanding the change, however, it was not correct to say, as had been stated by the last speaker, that a question involving large sums of money could be decided by the vote of the Chairman of a Committee and a Referee alone. A Referee, of course, might make his influence felt, and with two other Members of the Committee might outvote the Chairman, and he was not altogether sure that it was desirable in cases in which interests so important were concerned, that the votes of two Members should overrule those of the other two Members simply because of the casting vote of the Chairman. Even in a case to which the hon. Member for Glasgow had referred, in which there were two Members on one side and two on the other, on a division the result might have been the same as that he had stated, without the intervention of the Referees. He would also remind the House that, owing to the fatalities which attended the last General Election, it had been deprived of the services of several Members who had had great experience as Chairmen of Committees on Private Bills, and that it was well that those who succeeded them, and who had not the same experience, should have the assistance and advice which such men as the Referees were able to afford. He was aware that the hon. Member for Glasgow did not propose altogether to expel the Referees from those Committees; but if the House were to decide that a system which had been tried for several years, and with which the greatest satisfaction had been expressed out-of-doors, should be now abolished, a great blow would, in his opinion, have been struck at the authority of those officers. To strike such a blow would, he thought, be most inexpedient. The Referees were not merely assessors upon these Private Bill Committees; but they also formed part of a Court of locus standi, which was composed of five Members of this House and three paid Referees. There was likewise the Committee upon Unopposed Bills, upon which Referees also served. They could not deal with one of these matters affecting Referees without dealing with all of them. While upon the question of legality he might observe that it was a serious matter that the House should, after the present system had been in operation for eight years, and after numerous cases had been decided under it, cast a doubt upon the authority of those Committees, and, as it were, retrospectively invalidate their decisions. Surely, if the question of legality were to be tested at all, it should be tested outside those walls, where an authoritative exposition of the law could be obtained. He thought that the hon. Member for Glasgow would, under the circumstances, do well to pause, if it were only out of consideration for the interests which would be affected, before raising this question of legality. For his own part, while sufficiently aware of the anomaly of the practice of Referees having votes, he was as jealous as any other Member of the privileges of the House, and he frankly confessed that if they were now constructing these tribunals, he would not propose to give the Referees votes. They were, however, now looking back over the practice of the House which had existed for many years. He had only to add that he would promise to give his attention to the subject, and that he should be happy to confer upon it with his right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders, and others whose opinions were entitled to more weight than that of any individual Member on so great and important a point.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE thought the working of the present system had been most beneficial, but admitted that, in regard to expediency, a fair question had been raised by the proposition of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). He should not for a moment deprecate the full investigation before a Committee of the question of the maintenance of Referees as a constituent part of the Committees upstairs. However, he trusted the House would pause before taking a step which would stamp with illegality an act considered to be one of the privileges of the House—namely, that of appointing servants of the House to assist them in their deliberations on private Bills. He should deprecate a hasty Resolution condemning the legality of a system which had been sanctioned by the leading Members of the House, and which had been in operation for eight years.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was of opinion that, as the question had been raised, it must be settled, though whether it should be referred to the Committee proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) was another matter. The question that had been raised was, not whether the system had worked well, but whether the House had not gone beyond its power in allowing Referees to do that which it had no right to allow them to—that of taking part in making Acts of Parliament affecting the property of Her Majesty's subjects. He thought that his hon. Friend had very properly brought the subject before the House, and that as it had been raised, it could not be allowed to go to sleep.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY confessed he was much surprised to hear about a year ago that the Referees did vote, as it had never occurred to him to see a Referee vote. As the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had remarked, it was absolutely necessary that, the question having once been raised, must be settled. The House, in so doing, would not be throwing any discredit on what had been done in past years, if it called in question the powers of the Referees. The point was, whether the House was right in giving them those powers, and not whether the Referees had done wrong. There was no shadow of imputation upon the Referees, and, indeed, they deserved all the credit which had been given to them by his hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means. He should have liked to see the Motion in a very different form, but that was hardly worth while dwelling upon. In his judgment it would be well if a very strong Committee were appointed to investigate this matter. It must be settled at once, for the power of the Referees might be questioned from without, and then the House would be placed in a worse position than it occupied at present.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he should have been unwilling to concur in the present Motion, if his doing so were considered to indicate the slightest dissatisfaction with the way in which the Referees had discharged their duties; but the legality or "constitutional" of the arrangement having been now disputed, it ought to be decided.

MR. DODSON said, it appeared to him that after the speech of his hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means, the House had better endeavour to modify the terms in which it was proposed to appoint this Committee. His hon. Friend had pointed out with great force that the functions of the Referees could not be separated. In his (Mr. Dodson's) opinion, the best course would be for the hon. Member for Glasgow to withdraw the present Motion, and substitute for it a new one, for an inquiry into the working of the system of Referees. He would suggest that the Amendment should be confined to the appointment of a Committee "to inquire into the position of those Officers of the House called Referees."

MR. ANDERSON said, he preferred his own Amendment, as that suggested did not raise the Constitutional point.

MR. BUTT said, he also preferred the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow to that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester. The Bill referred to by the hon. Member for Glasgow as having been read a second time in the House was altered in Committee, in which the Referees took part, and when it came back for the third reading, it was not the Bill the House agreed to on the second reading.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

It was necessary, on Constitutional grounds, that some alterations should take place.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire and report on the position of the Referees of the House on Private Bills, and particularly as to the legality and expediency of allowing the Referees the same power of voting on a Private Bill Committee as a Member of Parliament regularly elected by a constituency.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE IRISH LAND BILL. OBSERVATIONS.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he wished to call attention to the fact that the second reading of the Irish Land Bill, introduced by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), had been fixed for Wednesday, the 29th of March. It was a measure which the people of Ireland considered as of paramount importance, and in which they took a deep and burning interest. The agricultural population of Ireland numbered considerably more than 3,000,000, and a general feeling of insecurity pervaded that population. What they required was a Parliamentary title to their homes, and they naturally looked forward with intense interest to the discussion of a measure which was introduced at their express desire to secure to them that Parliamentary title. It was clear that a Wednesday sitting would be wholly inadequate for the discussion of the measure.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE rose to Order. Was the hon. Member regular, he inquired, in discussing, on the Question that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply, whether an Order of the Day fixed for the 29th of March should not be debated on some other day? The House having fixed the day, that determination could not be altered, except by a direct Resolution of the House itself.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member had not proceeded far enough to satisfy him that the object referred to by the right hon. Gentleman was that which he had in view. If it were, the hon. Member was clearly out of Order in questioning the decision of the House that a particular Bill should be put on the Orders of the Day for reading a second time on a given day.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, his object was to point out that a Wednesday sitting of five-and-a-half hours would be wholly insufficient for a satisfactory debate of the subject dealt with by the Bill, and to suggest to the hon. and learned Gentleman whether another day could not be secured.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Gentleman was out of Order. If he desired the Order of the Day to which he referred to be discharged, it must be done by substantive Motion. It could not be done on a Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he would bow to the decision of the Chair, and would, before bringing the matter before the House in the form of a Motion, consult his Friends in respect to the terms of it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES. CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

- (1.) £43,489, House of Lords Offices.
- (2.) £50,006, House of Commons Offices,
- (3.) £58,010, Treasury.
- (4.) £90,178, Home Office.
- (5.) £63,196, Foreign Office.
- (6.) £34,755, Colonial Office.
- (7.) £145,958, Board of Trade.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,773, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Lord Privy Seal."

MR. MONK said, that the Vote had usually been objected to on the ground that the office of Lord Privy Seal was practically a sinecure, and useless. The only excuse offered for maintaining it was that it enabled the Government to confer the office upon some excellent and valued Member of the House of Lords who might be able to give attention to matters which the heads of other Departments were unable to do. He could not but think that the parties responsible should perform those duties, and not the Lord Privy Seal, who was not responsible. He would not move the rejection of the Vote himself, but he would vote with any hon. Member who would challenge it.

MR. JAMES supported the opposition to this expenditure, and expressed his regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, when in office, had not done away with this appointment. There was a strong feeling in the constituencies against sinecure offices.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he should like to ask whether it was true, as was said, that there were no duties connected with the office; because, if not, there was no occasion for the Lord Privy Seal to have a chief clerk and an establishment costing the country £750 a-year.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, it was a monstrous thing that they should be called upon to vote the money without any information of the duties attached to the office. It would only have been respectful to the Committee if some explanation on the subject had been given them by a Member of the Government.

MR. DISRAELI said, that the subject had been so often before the House, and had been so completely and recently discussed, that he had not thought it necessary to rise before, more especially as the few Gentlemen who had addressed the Committee did not appear disposed to persist in their objection to the Vote. The office of Lord Privy Seal was one not only of great dignity and antiquity, but also of great utility, and, far from thinking that because the Lord Privy Seal had not a Department to organize and manage he ought not to be a Member of the Cabinet, it was because he had no Department to manage that his presence in the Cabinet was often of the greatest advantage. The office had been held by many experienced and eminent men. Lord Halifax—one of the most efficient public men of our generation—was Lord Privy Seal, and the present Lord Privy Seal had presided over the most laborious Department of the Government. It was, indeed, a great advantage to a Government to have such men as Lord Halifax and Lord Malmesbury available for general consultation and advice. There were many duties which the Lord Privy Seal was called upon to discharge, which it was impossible to indicate on an occasion like the present; but he had sometimes allotted to him some of great delicacy and importance, when it could not be expected that a Secretary of State or the President of a laborious Department could give the time required for such performance. The Lord Privy Seal was always ready to attend to such duties. The present Lord Privy Seal represented also an important Department—the Admiralty—in the House of Lords, and was there to give information when it was asked for. He remembered that Lord Malmesbury was intrusted in a former Government over which he (Mr. Disraeli) presided with negotiating a matter which the Members for Ireland ought not to consider insignificant. When it was necessary to hold communications with the Roman Catholic clergy and other Bodies in attempting to bring about an arrangement on the Education question, the person intrusted with the negotiation was the present Lord Privy Seal. He appealed to the Committee to support the Vote, which any one who had had experience of the Government of this country must feel to be necessary, and which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) two or three years ago had vindicated to the complete satisfaction of the House.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that last year the Prime Minister, upon the question of the publication of the debates, had attributed to him the wish to form a "Speech Preservation Society." He ought now to admit that if such a society existed it would save a great deal of public time, and serve a useful end, for during every Session since he had been in Parliament he had heard a debate on this particular subject. The vote he should now give he would admit would not be the same that he had first given, because the reasons advanced by the late and present Prime Ministers appeared to him to be overwhelming in favour of the Vote. If there were any proper record of these debates and the explanations given by the Minister, hon. Members would not be always called upon to repeat the same objections to this Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 145; Noes 50: Majority 95.

(9.) £33,500, Charity Commission.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he had formerly complained of the want of celerity on the part of the Endowed Schools Commissioners in dealing with schemes for the management of endowed schools. Since then the House had transferred the endowed schools to the Charity Commissioners. The Chief Commissioner, Sir James Hill, a man of great ability, recently died, and in his place the Government had appointed a right hon. Gentleman against whom he desired to say nothing—Sir Seymour Fitzgerald—who had been incapacitated by illness from attending to the duties of the office. The result had been that if the former Commission was slow, the present Commission was slower, for the work which was before too much for three men had to be discharged by two. He believed several schools were awaiting the next step in the settlement of their schemes; and yet that no communication of any kind had been made to them for the last two or three months. He, therefore, desired some information as to the prospect of this deadlock being removed.

MR. MONK desired to know, whether there was any qualification for the office of Chief Commissioner; and, if so, what it was?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, it was unfortunately true that the late Chief Commissioner died suddenly in the month of September, and the new Chief Commissioner had been suffering from illness since his appointment. It was possible that the death of the former Commissioner, the necessary delay in filling up the office, and the illness of the present Chief Commissioner might have retarded the business of the Department; and, although no representation on the subject had reached the Treasury, he would undertake that inquiry should be made and measures taken, if possible, to facilitate the business forthwith. As to the qualifications for the office, he believed one of them was that the Chief Commissioner should be a barrister of 12 years' standing.

MR. GOLDSMID appealed to the Vice President of the Education Department to say whether any arrangement could be made to expedite the work of the Commission. Had not great delay occurred in reference to some schools in the country? He was well aware that the duties of the Commissioners could not be interfered with by the Education Department. Still, as the House had no organ through whom to communicate with the Commissioners, they were obliged to appeal to the Treasury Bench for information.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he was glad to have the opportunity of saying a few words. He had no business to interfere officially with the Charity Commission; and, like his Predecessor in office, he had given the House a pledge not to do so. It was only due to the present Chief Commissioner it should be known that he had been suffering from a severe attack of typhoid fever, and in his anxiety concerning the duties of his office he allowed a Commissioner to come to his bedside to dispose of some official business. The result was, he was thrown back seriously and his recovery rendered doubtful, and the medical men prohibited any further communication with him on official matters. Of course, the business of the office had necessarily suffered, first, from the death of the late Chief Commissioner, then from delay in filling up the vacancy, and, lastly, from the lamentable illness of the present Chief Commissioner. The Lord President took all the official steps he could to forward business, and used the power conferred upon him to enable one of the other Commissioners to sign certain official documents. In that way he had removed all the difficulties he could, and he need hardly say the Department was anxious that the business of the Commission should proceed with all possible despatch.

SIR ANDREW LUSK, calling attention to the great cost of the Commission, asked whether a large portion of it could not be borne by the charitable funds, for the due management of which it was called into existence?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the question had been seriously considered by the Treasury whether it was expedient, and, if so, possible, to keep up the Charity Commission by taxing charities. But great difficulties stood in the way. A great portion of the work performed was of a voluntary nature, and if a tax were imposed on the receipt and administration of their funds, it was quite open to the great majority of charities to remove their funds from the inspection and control of the Commissioners. On the whole, great public good was done by the management of that body; the operation of the charities being brought under the light of day rather than withdrawn from the Charity Commission.

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,893, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Civil Service Commission."

MR. BAXTER rose to call attention to the increase of the Vote by the addition of £500 to the salary of the Chief Commissioner. The Second Commissioner received £1,200, and an additional Commissioner had been appointed. As no greater duties had been devolved on the Commission than were formerly performed, he wished to know why there had been an increase in the salaries of the Commissioners of £1,700?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that it had been found necessary to appoint Mr. Walrond, the former Secretary, a third Commissioner, and Lord Hampton had been appointed First Commissioner on the death of Sir Edward Ryan. It was true that the duties of the Commission were not of a wider character than those which they had discharged on the previous year, but still they had been growing in importance and magnitude for a long time past. They were in a very large degree independent of any public Department. The duties discharged by the Commission were most delicate and responsible, and it was therefore desirable that the Commission should be a strong one, having the confidence of Parliament. The Government, therefore, thought it advisable to appoint Lord Hampton to the position of First Commissioner, as he was a statesman of great experience in public and official life, and it was desirable to have some one in Parliament who would be able to account for the action of the Commission, in case it should be questioned. The increase of salaries had for a long time been promised, and he believed was very well deserved by the officers of the Department.

MR. BAXTER said, he had not found fault with the appointment of Lord Hampton, but the Secretary of the Treasury had given the Committee no information as to the necessity for appointing an additional Commissioner and increasing the salary of the First Commissioner. If any one was inclined to question the Vote he should support him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the constitution of the Civil Service Commission, as now arranged, was similar to that of other public Boards, such as the Inland Revenue Board, where a Chairman and two Commissioners received the same rate of remuneration as in the present case. It was difficult to say that there had been any immediate increase of duties as compared with last year, but there could be no doubt that for a considerable time past the importance of the Civil Service Commission had been increasing; and under the Order in Council which had just received Her Majesty's approval it was probable that more duties would be thrown upon the Commission than it now discharged. Hitherto the Commission had been in a position both important and invidious, and when their conduct was challenged it was difficult to say who was responsible. The object of the Government in placing Lord Hampton, a Member of the other House, at the head of the Commission was that there might be some one who could authoritatively explain the policy and proceedings of the Commission. Like the Audit Office, they acted to a considerable degree as a check on the proceedings of other Departments, and must be in an independent position, not subject to the direction of any Department over whose proceedings they were intended to be a check. By putting the Commission on a more important footing, they were doing what they could to strengthen it in the eyes of the public, and enable it more efficiently to hold its own in the various important duties it had to discharge. He thought the work to be done by the Commission was fairly worth the money proposed as compared with that paid in other public Departments.

MR. MONK asked, under what Act of Parliament the new Commissioner had been appointed; and why the Vote was introduced in a different manner from the other Votes, the Act under which the salaries were authorized not being quoted?

MR. W. H. SMITH reminded the Committee that the Civil Service Commission was not constituted under an Act of Parliament, but by Order in Council.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU did not think the reasons given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer sufficient to account for the increase of the Vote. It seemed that the work of the Commissioners would be more in future; but in that case they should wait, and not have their salaries increased before they had the work to do. He thought £2,160 was too much to pay for bringing the Civil Service Commission into symmetry with other public Departments.

MR. MACDONALD said, he should move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,700, for it was evidently time that the House should put a stop to the contemplated increase of all the Estimates. It was said that the work to be performed was of a delicate character. If it was considered that the person appointed to perform it was 76 years of age, it ought to be delicate work indeed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £21,193, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Civil Service Commission."—(Mr. Macdonald.)

MR. MUNDELLA said, he would support the proposed reduction, though larger than he would have desired; but it did appear as though what had been done was something like the creation of a sinecure. Sir Edward Ryan was very advanced in years, and a great deal of work could not have been required of him. But on his demise two gentlemen had been appointed to do the work which he had done—Lord Hampton with a salary of £2,000 a-year, or £500 more than Sir Edward Ryan had, and a new Commissioner, with £1,200 a-year. With the prospect of bad trade and a declining revenue, there would probably be a Nemesis, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer might find it as much as he could do to make ends meet.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he felt bound to correct what was no doubt an unintentional misrepresentation of something which had fallen from him. What he stated was, that comparing this year with the last there was no special increase of work, but there had been a considerable increase of late years, and a still further increase might be expected in consequence of the new Order in Council. It should be remembered that Lord Hampton, though of advanced years, was a man of energy, was every day at his office, and took an active part in the discharge of his duties. He would have thought that anyone who had sat in the House of Commons with Lord Palmerston would not have laid down the rule that men advanced in years were not able to work. Lord Hampton had by nature a great desire for work, and it had never before been suggested that he had ever flinched from it. As to the other Commissioner, Mr. Walrond, he had for many years ably filled the office of Secretary, and had well earned his promotion and the small increase of pay which accompanied it. Certain other arrangements had been made in the office which had led to the promotion of gentlemen who had been engaged in the Department, and whose salaries it would have been only reasonable to have raised even if these arrangements had not been made. The office of Secretary had been conferred upon Mr. Horace Mann, who had been acting as registrar, and he took some additional duties, and received a very small addition to his salary. Mr. Headlam, who had for many years been acting as chief examiner, was now promoted to the office of director of examinations, with an addition to his salary, which had been well earned by 20 years' valuable service. When it was said that there was no additional work, it must have been forgotten that the examination of officers in the Army had of late years been added to the duties of the Commissioners. He must repeat that as Questions were often asked in Parliament as to the conduct of the Commissioners, and the Government could only say that they were an independent body with whom Ministers could not interfere, it was an advantage that there should be some one—not necessarily in the House of Peers, though in that, too, there might be some advantage, inasmuch as he would be more dissociated from politics—who could give the necessary explanations and speak with authority.

MR. BAXTER said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to intimate that in consequence of the raising of the salaries, there had been a certain amount of saving in the office. But, on the contrary, though no additional clerks had been appointed, there was an absolute increase of £2,160 a-year in the office itself and £250 for writers.

MR. DILLWYN said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) that this was like the creation of a sinecure. For many years past the tendency of Parliament had been to keep down the Estimates, but now that we had got a new régime economy was at a discount. Not one valid argument had been adduced for giving the increase of salary to Lord Hampton.

MR. E. J. REED contended that the men who had been all their lives in a particular Department, and had served the country faithfully, were entitled to advancement when an opportunity arose. If the opposite rule were to be adopted, and persons from outside brought into an office to supplant those who had all along worked in it, great damage would be done, and the class of Civil servants must inevitably be deteriorated. Nobody could object to Mr. Walrond's promotion.

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) had not touched the point which would cause the Vote to be looked at with suspicion. A vacancy in the Commission occurred, and the Secretary was most properly appointed to fill it; but, beyond that, the objection was to the appointment of a new man, besides and above the other two, as an ornamental Commissioner, who received £500 more than was given to the working Commissioner who had been his predecessor.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER protested against the idea that Lord Hampton was in any sense an ornamental Commissioner. [Laughter.] He meant a merely ornamental Commissioner. Lord Hampton had taken to his work with all the zeal he had shown in other Departments; he was thoroughly mastering the work, and there was no question of a sinecure at all. The appointment was made simply with a view of strengthening the Commission, and placing it on the same footing as the great Revenue Departments. The importance of an office was a good deal measured by the salary of its Chief, and the re-organization of the office on this scale had done something to strengthen its position. It was true that, notwithstanding a reduction effected by Mr. Headlam's promotion—a junior examiner being appointed with £300, instead of £800, a-year—there was not a saving in the whole office, but an increase. But the position of the persons in this office had been for several years under consideration by the Treasury, and it was felt that as their duties were increasing they deserved some increase of pay.

MR. WHITWELL agreed that a stimulus was necessary to keep an officer in good heart. The chief objection of the opponents of the appointment was that where a vacancy occurred advantage was not taken of it to advance all those who formed the staff of the service a step in promotion. Nothing could have been more annoying to these worthy, steady, hardworking men than to find a nobleman from the outside promoted over their heads.

MR. SAMUELSON asked, whether there was any precedent for the appointment of an outside gentleman to a prominent position in the Civil Service at the age of 76?

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, it was pleaded by the Government that there was a great deal of new work to be accomplished in the office. If that were so, he should like to know what it was, and who was doing it, for he observed that the staff was, with the exception of Lord Hampton, exactly the same as last year.

MR. GOLDSMID reminded the Committee that while this appointment had been made of a nobleman to the highest office in the Civil Service at the age of 76, it was a rule of the service that men in a lower grade should be superannuated at the age of 60. Was this fair? Moreover, it was true that the late Sir Edward Ryan performed his duties with great ability at the age of 85; but how was it that three Commissioners were now required to do the work previously done by two, including one Commissioner aged 85?

MR. M'LAREN said, he wished to point out the proportions in the increase of the Vote in question. Last year the Vote was £20,000; this year it was £22,000—that was to say, there was an increase of 10 per cent. It was said there had been an increase in the work of the Department, but the same thing was said by every one of the Departments every year. Why, then, should there not be 10 per cent of an increase allowed to all the Departments? The expenses of all the Departments, deducting the National Debt and Crown Land offices, amounted to £45,000,000, and if an increase of 10 per cent were allowed to all the Departments there would be a total increase of £4,500,000.

MR. JAMES suggested that henceforth the Civil Service Estimates should be introduced by a speech in the same way as were the Army and Navy Estimates.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not answered the objections urged, and unless the matter was fully explained he should move to report Progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would be exceedingly sorry for it to be supposed that he was wanting in respect to any Member of the House. He had given the only answer he could give, and he had no doubt that to most hon. Gentlemen it was satisfactory; but it appeared that there were other hon. Members to whom his explanations were not satisfactory. If they were not satisfied he was sorry, but he could not help it. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson), he was not able at present to call to mind any precedent for the appointment of a gentleman of the age of Lord Hampton; but this he could say, that in appointing Lord Hampton the Government had appointed a man who was thoroughly competent for the work.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked whether, if Lord Hampton should take a different view of any question affecting his Department from that taken by the Government, he would still be under the influence of the Government? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No.] Then was he to be independent of the Government? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Yes.] That was unfortunate, and quite contrary to usage. It was a doubtful precedent to appoint to an office of the kind a Peer of Parliament, who in the office he held should be perfectly independent of the Government which appointed him or of any succeeding Administration during his tenure of office. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The Ecclesiastical Commissioners are in the same position.] That was true enough; but the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were not paid by the Government, whereas Lord Hampton was. He thought it would have been far better had the Government, in selecting a successor to Sir Edward Ryan, appointed Mr. Walrond, a gentleman of great experience and ability, thoroughly acquainted with the Department, and who had gained the confidence of all connected with it.

MR. RAMSAY said, he objected to the Vote on the ground that no case had been made out for increasing the number of permanent officials in the Department.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 87: Majority 25.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the facts were so plain and the defence was so lame, that he thought at least one more division should be taken on the matter. He had to express his regret that the name of Lord Hampton should be mixed up in such a transaction. The Government had set a bad precedent in appointing to an important office one of their supporters whose age, in all human probability, would soon render him incapable of discharging the duties for which he was to receive £2,000 a-year. He would move that the Vote be reduced by £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £22,393, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Civil Service Commission."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. ANDERSON said, he could not see why, if Lord Hampton was not to do more work than his predecessor, he should receive a higher salary. He would therefore support the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 79: Majority 16.

MR. BUTT drew attention to the large sum derived from stamps paid by candidates for examination in the Civil Service.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, those fees were a heavy tax on competition.

MR. W. H. SMITH replied that the fees had been paid since the foundation of the Civil Service Commission, and there had been no change during the last few years. They were very varied, some being very small sums, while others amounted to £2 or £3. He would endeavour at some future time to give the hon. and learned Member such information on the subject as he desired.

MR. WHEELHOUSE complained that boys from the country were placed at a disadvantage by having to incur much larger expense than competitors from London or the neighbourhood in coming up for examination.

MR. MELDON asked why those fees were exacted?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he found the system in existence when he came into office, and did not feel it to be his duty to deprive the Exchequer of any funds. As these young gentlemen were seeking to obtain a reward which they could not get in ordinary life, it seemed only fair that they should pay some small amount of the necessary charge for ascertaining their qualifications.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY inquired on what authority the Commissioners levied the tax?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had no doubt they had the authority of the Treasury, but was not able to answer off-hand.

MR. BUTT considered that these sums, however small, were opposed to the principle of open competition.

(11.) £18,619, Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission.

SIR ANDREW LUSK expressed a hope that the Commissioners would not in future legalize such inclosures as had caused so much difficulty in regard to Epping Forest.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was not aware that the Commissioners had had anything to do with the inclosures of Epping Forest. Two of them were barristers who had given particular attention to the law as it affected land, and the third was well known in agricultural matters.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £8,600, Inclosure and Drainage Acts, Imprest Expenses.

(14.) £4,496, Registry of Friendly Societies.

MR. COWAN said, he noticed an increase of nearly £1,500 in the Vote. Was that due to the cost of carrying out the Friendly Societies Act of last year?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, it was, and he was afraid it would be larger next year, as there might be some additional charge for actuarial service. The item would be a permanent one.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £693,287, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board, including various Grants in aid of Local Taxation."

MR. MELDON, in rising to move a reduction of £1,000 on the portion of the Vote applicable to the medical department, said, his object in doing so was not to oppose the sum voted by Parliament for public vaccination expenses in England, about £10,000 a-year, but to point out the injustice done to Ireland in that matter. The only State grant of any kind made to Ireland for the purposes of vaccination amounted to £400 a-year, and the medical department of the Privy Council withheld from that country the assistance in regard to the supply of vaccine lymph which it ought in fairness to receive. Medical men in Ireland were now obliged to take lymph from children's arms, and as the people had a strong objection to this practice vaccination had become extremely unpopular. The difficulty arose from the defective supply of vaccine lymph. Up to 1871 Ireland was supplied to a great extent with vaccine lymph, through the Cow-pock Institution in that country; and a greater supply could be obtained, if thought desirable, from England. In 1871, from some unexplained cause, it seemed good to the Privy Council to change the system in Ireland. The Cow-pock Institution in Dublin could not supply the whole country, and the Government offered to supply vaccine lymph if the Institution would reduce its charges from 2s. 6d. to 6d. The Cow-pock Institution complained of the conduct of the Privy Council. He did not grudge any increased Vote for England, but he was compelled by the Forms of the House to adopt the course he did to obtain justice. He would conclude by moving the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £692,287, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1877, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board, including various Grants in aid of Local Taxation."—(Mr. Meldon.)

MR. M'LAREN suggested whether it would not be advisable to postpone the consideration of the Vote until after Wednesday, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had arranged to have a meeting with Scotch Members in reference to questions affecting Scotland similar to those which the Vote raised with respect to England. It would be better to hear what the right hon. Gentleman had to say on these subjects before passing the Vote.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that with regard to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) as to a breach of faith between the Privy Council and Ireland, he would have taken measures to inform himself on the subject if the hon. and learned Member had given him Notice of his intention to raise the question. He should be happy if the hon. and learned Member would confer with him on the matter. With respect to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), he did not see that any arrangements which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might make in relation to Scotland could possibly affect the arrangements under the Vote.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that what Irish Members desired to draw attention to was the fact that, proportionately keeping in view the different conditions of the two countries, more money was expended for vaccination in England than for the same purpose in Ireland. Ireland had of late suffered terribly from the want of vaccination; and, while he should be sorry to reduce the Vote for England, he thought that this was a proper opportunity for calling attention to what the state of matters in Ireland was.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that with reference to the grievance complained of in the case of Ireland, he had not had any opportunity of ascertaining what had previously been done in the matter, but suggested that if the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) would call attention to it again, he should endeavour to inform himself more fully, and if it could be shown that there was anything in the present system which operated against compulsory vaccination in Ireland, he should be most cordially disposed to make the necessary change.

MR. M'LAREN said, he did not agree with the President of the Local Government Board that the question of the arrangements under the Vote did not affect the case of Scotland. Under the head of medical department in the Vote, there was an expense of £24,900 for vaccination, &c. in England; yet the allowance to Scotland was only £500. The grants in aid to Poor Law schools in England was £36,500, while Scotland did not get a shilling. In England, the medical officers and inspectors of nuisances got £60,000, while in Scotland not one penny was given. Now, all these Votes for England ought to be objected to if Scotland was not to be properly treated in regard to the same matters; but he did not wish to raise a discussion until after the interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He therefore thought his request for a postponement of the Vote was a reasonable one.

DR. WARD said, he thought it was a matter well worthy the consideration of the Government whether free lymph should not be given to Ireland. In 1871 the system of giving free lymph was brought to a close; but there was the significant fact that following that there was the greatest outbreak of small-pox known in Ireland for 30 years.

MR. W. H. SMITH explained that none of the charges were new; and, while admitting that the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) were deserving the attention of the Government, he hoped the opposition to the Vote would be withdrawn.

MR. MELDON said, he thought the Vote ought to be postponed. The people of Ireland had reason to be dissatisfied that while £10,000 a-year was voted for vaccination in England, only £400 was voted for Ireland. He should, therefore, feel it was his duty to take the opinion of the Committee, as that was the only practicable opportunity they would have of dealing with the matter.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU explained the advantages that resulted from vaccinating children from arm to arm—that was, from taking the vaccine matter on the eighth day from the arm of a previously vaccinated child and introducing it into the arm of an unvaccinated child. Such a mode of vaccination was called the “living” vaccine matter, which was found to be far preferable to “dead” vaccine matter, often found to be acrid, and sometimes putrid, a state which was apt to produce serious consequences to the patient.

MR. WADDY said, he could not understand how knocking off the lymph for England would get it for Ireland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not see why the Vote should be postponed on account of the pleasure he was going to enjoy from an interview with the Scotch Members on Wednesday. What was proposed for England was what had always been done for England, and if there were circumstances which required a distinction in the case of Scotland that was a separate question. If he understood them aright, the Scotch Members did not want less done for England, but more done for Scotland. How the case might turn out upon examination, however, he did not know, and would rather not discuss now.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY remarked, that although the Scotch Members had brought the subject forward on former occasions, they had not pressed it, trusting to subsequent Votes to put the matter right. That course had not met the reward they expected, and therefore now they must insist on the question being taken seriously into consideration. He would move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. James Barclay.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought it would be better to settle each case on its own merits. Scotchmen really had no cause to complain.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that six times as much was spent for vaccination per head of the population in England as in Ireland; and Irish Members only wished to bring Ireland in this respect up to the English level. They did not wish to reduce the English Vote, but the Forms of the House compelled them to bring the matter forward in this shape.

MR. DILLWYN said, the object of the Scotch and Irish Members could hardly be attained by reducing the English Vote. He was always prepared to support the Irish Members in any way he could; but he could not on this question vote for a reduction of the English Vote, especially as it had not been shown to be too large.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH explained that the present Vote had been readily agreed to for years; the various items of it sprung out of Acts of Parliament which were still in force.

DR. CAMERON said, he considered that there were two ways of treating the matter—by leaving local funds entirely to themselves all over the country, or by subsidizing local funds in every part of the Kingdom alike. Either they must do away with the unequal grant of contributions by taking advantage of the exigencies of the Government, or obtain a promise that equal justice should be done to Scotland and Ireland as to England.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH thought that the Vote ought to be agreed to on its merits, and the other matters discussed on a subsequent occasion.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had not proposed the reduction of any Vote for England. He had merely mentioned the fact that England got £25,000 a-year for vaccination purposes, including the payment of medical men, and Scotland only £500, while Scotland paid between a sixth and a seventh of the whole national Revenue. Last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer had an interview with the Scotch Members on the subject. They had great pleasure in listening to him, and all went away in great good humour, having no doubt from the right hon. Gentleman's kind words that he would make all right. Now, however, on returning to the Estimates they found the old rigid figures. The English expenses under the item had increased from year to year, while the Scotch Grant for medical expenses was the same as it was 20 years ago.

MR. RAMSAY said, he would be glad to hear the grounds on which the Grant was made for teachers in Poor Law schools in England, and what was the corresponding Grant in the case of Scotland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that favours to Scotland were included in the Estimates. He (Mr. Ramsay) was not aware of any item in which favour was obtained by Scotland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to the grant in aid of pauper lunatics. He was kind enough to make a concession to Scotland in consideration of the system under which lunatics were cared for in Scotland, which was altogether different from the English system. But the Scottish Members would never object to have the law relating to lunatics administered in the same way in England as it was in Scotland, and to let the Grant become what it might if the same system was adopted. But it must not be said, where the law was so entirely different, that a favour was granted to Scotland. He had to complain of the difference between the Grant for teachers for pauper schools in England and what was done in Scotland. [Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH explained that there were no exclusively pauper schools in Scotland.] He would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to direct him to any Grant corresponding to the £36,500 proposed to be voted for the payment of teachers in Poor Law schools in England. Scotland had no such Grant. But the Scotch were taxpayers into the Imperial Treasury in the same way as the people of England. But although there were no schools in Scotland exclusively for teaching pauper children, there were a great number of the children of the poor educated at the expense of the parochial boards, and they asked that, the circumstances of Scotland being considered, they should get a Grant in proportion to the taxes they paid. They asked no favour—only justice; nothing more. That these Votes were the same from year to year was the matter of which they complained. So far they had got nothing more in consequence of their representations than courteous words. They wanted evidence of the sincerity of those words. No other course was open to them than to challenge the Votes put before them; because it was not competent by the Forms of the House for any hon. Member to propose an augmentation of a Grant.

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY said, that after what had been elicited from the Government he should withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed,

Mr. WHITWELL asked, whether the £330,000 voted last year in aid of pauper lunatics in this country would be required, as the Committee had no information in reference to the expenditure of that Vote before them? He would also like to know, whether in future the sum of 4s. per week would be allowed for the maintenance of such lunatics in workhouses? He believed that there was an increase of lunacy in the country, and that the question of the proper management of lunatics would have to be discussed sooner or later by that House.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the sum mentioned was within a fraction of that which had been required. So far as the Returns went, there was no growth of lunacy in this country out of proportion to the increase of the population. As to the 4s., he hoped soon to see the day when full provision would be made for the lunatics in workhouses.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(17.) £50,250, Mint, including Coinage.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, the abolition of the Mastership of the Mint was to be regretted: it gave a Minister means of rewarding great scientific merit: it had been held by Sir Isaac Newton and other very distinguished persons. He should be glad to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer who was responsible for the coinage and designs at the Mint? Of late years a great deterioration had taken place in the designs; not very long ago a large coinage of sovereigns had to be recalled. As to the silver coinage it was most discreditable: some one might be found who could turn out coin worthy of the country.

Mr. ANDERSON expressed his surprise at the moderation of the Vote, and inquired whether the idea of acquiring a new site for the Mint had been abandoned?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that though nominally he was responsible, yet, in fact, the working of the Mint was under the direction of the Deputy Master, who was most attentive to his duties, and most anxious in every way to produce work which would be profitable to the office which he held. He was quite sure that if at any time his friend Mr. Fremantle came to him with a proposal on this subject his suggestions would receive warm support. But Mr. Fremantle laboured under this difficulty, that the Mint was by no means in the condition in which it ought to be. The service was carried on there in constant fear and trembling lest there should be a breakdown of the machinery, and suitable machinery could not be substituted without causing a stoppage of the work. Under these circumstances both he and his predecessors in office had been anxious to procure a site for the erection of a new Mint, the cost of which in the long run would not be very expensive, as they would be able to recover a large proportion of it by the sale of the existing Mint. Some two years ago there was a proposal to purchase another place, but it failed; and at the present moment negotiations were in progress to purchase some premises in the neighbourhood of Waterloo Bridge. They had been going on for a good many months, and, he hoped, would be successful. If that were so, it would be their duty to bring the question before the House. As to the coiner and engraver, payment was made for the work done, and that was all he knew of the matter.

MR. MUNTZ said, that it was a mistake to suppose that silver and copper coinage was carried on at considerable cost to the country. So far from that being the case, there was usually a profit of about £100,000 a-year. He hoped the Deputy Master would be enabled to present to the House a profit and loss account in connection with the matter.

MR. ANDERSON thought the site of the present Mint was better than any other that could be procured; but having gone over the place, he felt bound to admit that the building was so badly arranged that it would be impossible to make the necessary improvements without stopping the works, and therefore the only alternative was to erect a new Mint on another site.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER put it to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether the removal of the Mint to such a close neighbourhood as surrounded Waterloo Bridge might not be attended with injurious consequences to the health of the inhabitants.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would admit that the residents in the neighbourhood of the proposed new site had objected to the erection of the Mint there, because the manufacture involved the production of injurious or disagreeable gases. But the Committee that two or three years ago sat on the transfer of the Mint, and before whom that point was strongly urged, pointed out that there was no necessity for such being the case. There were two processes employed in minting coin

—one which evolved smoke and gases, and the other that did not; and the former process was, he believed, carried on in a neighbouring refinery that did not belong to the Government. An undertaking was offered before the Select Committee that if the Mint were brought into the neighbourhood of the Savoy, as he hoped it would, no melting should be carried on which would cause these gases to be evolved, and he would undertake that care should be exercised in these particulars.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, the only fault he had, in common with the public, to find with the sovereign was that he got too few of them. The present Mint was in a very inconvenient place, and the building occupied a large space that might be better and more usefully turned to account, being better suited for docks, railway termini, or similar purposes. He did not see why the Mint should be kept at the East End if it was unhealthy, as was said, and the poor people be punished. It was better that it should be at the West End, where the inhabitants were better able to employ a doctor and take care of themselves than were the poor in the East. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would carry out the ideas shadowed forth, and give us a Mint worthy of the country, situated in a place more convenient and better adapted for its purposes than the present structure.

MR. LOCKE objected, as he had done from the first, to the erection of a new Mint on the Thames Embankment. That Embankment was not intended for such a purpose, and if a Mint was erected there it would be as great a nuisance as gasworks and other buildings which were so strongly objected to, and some of which had been already removed. He should really like to know why the place for coining money should be removed from its present position. It had long occupied the site. There was ample space for all purposes, a large sum had been expended on the building, and the people and businesses of the neighbourhood were adapted to the circumstances. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would inform the Committee where the new Mint was to be placed, and hoped the Thames Embankment, which ought to be an elegant place, but unfortunately was not, would not be selected as the new site, for no one could think it would be improved by such a class of building. He could only account for the desire to remove the Mint from its present locality, from there being somebody behind who wished to acquire the site for building ground for their own advantage.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the best answer he could make to the hon. Member for Southwark was to say that whenever the Government were in a position to make a definite proposition to the House they would do so, and then the House would be able freely to discuss it. The site upon the Thames Embankment upon which it was proposed to build the new Mint belonged partly to the Duchy of Lancaster, partly to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and partly to the Marquess of Salisbury, and it was in the neighbourhood of the Savoy.

COMMONS BILL—[BILL 51.]

(Mr. Assheton Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That this House considers that the Bill does not provide sufficient facilities for the regulation and improvement of commons in their present open condition, and is of opinion that, after the recent decisions given in regard to Epping Forest and other cases, where inclosures have been illegally and arbitrarily made, no inclosures should be permitted except under the special sanction of Parliament," said, he had been under the impression in listening to the excellent speech of the Home Secretary in bringing in this Bill that it was substantially the same measure as that of 1871, which was referred to a Select Committee and received the sanction of that House, but which was rejected by the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman, however, disclaimed that comparison, and rightly so, because it differed on many important points from the Bill of 1871. In some respects he was bound to admit that it was an improvement on that measure, but in other and more important respects it was far behind it. The clause which remitted the matter to the consideration of the Inclosure Commissioners before they gave their assent to any inclosure was a good one, and had been framed with the obvious intention of limiting inclosures as far as possible. The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing the Bill, seemed to be far from anxious to extend inclosures, and evidently wished that lands which could not be inclosed to the advantage of the public should remain uninclosed. He would not, however, enter upon any invidious comparison between the two Bills; but, having given much attention to the matter, and having done something to hasten on the progress of public opinion on this subject by those rapid strides which the Home Secretary had referred to, he might claim a right to criticize the measure. Its defects were these—The Bill did not provide any remedy for the protection of the public against the violent and arbitrary inclosures of common land of which they had had so many illustrations in past years, and which at a great expense had been declared illegal. The clauses for the regulation and improvement of commons would be nugatory and useless, and sufficient security was not provided that the interest of the agricultural labourer when inclosure took place should be properly protected. Before discussing these defects, he desired to say a few words on the extent of our commons and manorial wastes, and the history of legislation affecting them. Their extent had been estimated, sometimes at 5,000,000 acres and at other times at 7,500,000 acres; but we were now informed by the Home Secretary that the Inclosure Commissioners had come to the conclusion that the waste lands did not exceed more than 2,500,000 acres, of which only 800,000 acres were improvable. Since then an apparently more careful estimate had been produced in the Return of landholders, which had been called the second Domesday Book, and, according to that, the aggregate amount of uninclosed places and waste lands was only

1,500,000 acres, of which 1,200,000 acres were in England, and 300,000 acres in Wales. The Return showed the distribution of this waste land in the respective counties, and it appeared that Cumberland, Westmoreland, Yorkshire, and Devonshire, and the other mountainous counties, contained 950,000 acres, leaving only 266,000 acres for the other counties; and when 60,000 acres were subtracted for the New Forest, which Parliament had decided should be left open, and 40,000 for the Surrey Commons, the westerly winds over which contributed so much to the salubrity and health of London, and which the Home Secretary had admitted ought not to be inclosed, it would be seen that the quantity of land available for inclosures was reduced to a small amount. The Returns from Bedford, Bucks, Oxford, Hants, and other counties showed that that was the case, and that, as he had said, there had been great exaggeration as to the amount of these waste lands, and they ought to take care that the Government did not give any unnecessarily due facilities for these inclosures for private purposes by private persons. He quite agreed with the Home Secretary's statement that any food that could possibly be produced by the inclosure of these lands would be but a mere trifle, and that they must depend under unaltered circumstances on supplies from other countries, while the wastes and commons should be looked upon as health reserves for the benefit of the community at large. The difficulty in dealing with the question of commons arose from the fact that the legal position of the public and of the agricultural labourers was not in harmony with practice and facts. According to the strict technical law, invented by the feudal lawyers—and superseding a much wider and more popular law, under which undoubtedly the commons were the common property of the village or community—the commons were the property of the lords of manors, and the tenants of their manors, and the public had no right to them, no matter how long or how much they had used them for recreation, no matter how necessary they might be for the health of the district. It was true that the law had recognized the right of inhabitants of a village to the village green acquired by user and by the custom of playing games and dancing; but the law seemed to have drawn no analogy between the village and its green and the populous town or district and its common, no matter how close that analogy might be. By a miserable technicality a custom must be limited to a limited class or to a limited custom, and it was said that a custom for all the world to recreate and play games on such a common as Blackheath or Hackney, which were, in fact, playgrounds, was bad because it was too general. Technically, also, commons might be inclosed with the consent of lords of manors and their commoners, but in practice this consent could not be obtained; and by the old Statute of Merton, passed in the interest of agriculture, a lord of the manor could inclose provided he left sufficiency of common to the commoners. This statute was practically obsolete and only applied to common of pasture. The lord could not avail himself of it, and as the onus of proving that a sufficiency of common was left for the other commoners lies with the lord, it was admitted that this could never be done. In all the great cases which had occupied the Law Courts of late years, although the Statute of Merton was always pleaded, it had never since been attempted to show that a sufficiency of common had been left. Now, this being the very unsatisfactory state of the technical law, practically the case was very different. The commons were kept open by the adverse interests of lords of manors and commoners, by the impossibility of getting consents, by the uncertainty as to what the rights were and who were entitled to them; and it was the experience of ages that commons could not be lawfully inclosed without the sanction of Parliament. If it were not so, why the many hundred private Inclosure Acts, why the General Inclosure Act, why this Bill? So long as the commons remained open the public enjoyed them. The public were what the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had called "dispunishable trespassers." In respect, however, of the commons in populous districts, this difficulty had arisen. By the growth of populations enjoying the common without stint or without any power on the part of the lords and commoners to restrain them, the circumstances of the commons greatly altered, and it became impossible or unprofitable for the commoners to exercise their rights. They ceased to turn out their cattle upon them, they no longer burnt the turf. People took the place of cattle, they wore down the grass in lieu of browsing on it, the turf was more useful for games than for burning. The law, however, had not been pliant enough to recognize this practical transfer of user and custom, or to legitimize the public user which had thus ousted the private user. In ancient times, the commoners were, for the most part, copyholders, who were mere tenants of the will of the lord liable to be ousted at any moment, villeins and serfs who had no rights of any kind; but by degrees these customs of the copyholders ripened into right, and the lawyers of those days recognized that long-established custom gave sanction to right, and the conversion of villeins and tenants-at-will into customary copyholders with certain tenure, had always been looked back to by our law-writers and historians as an act of great justice and most advantageous to the country. But now-a-days the law failed to grasp the same principles, and to recognize the customary user of the people as one equally deserving of consideration. The Home Secretary very rightly dated back the change of opinion with regard to commons to the year 1865, when a very important Committee investigated the subject of the Commons round London. Though this Bill did not apply to metropolitan commons, yet the principles laid down by that Committee applied equally to all commons, or, at all events, those within reach of other populous places. It was contended before the Committee by the agents of the lords of manors that by the disuser of rights the commons practically belonged to them free of rights, and that they could inclose at will. The Committee, however, was of opinion after hearing much evidence, that the rights of common of the commoners, though disused, still subsisted at law sufficient to prevent inclosure, and that the commoners might be expected to put them in force to prevent inclosure. They rejected, therefore, a scheme for the purchase of the commons which would have involved paying £6,000,000 to £7,000,000 for that which the public had always used, and they recommended the scheme under which the commons might be placed under proper regulation and management for the prevention of nuisances and the maintenance of order, and under which the ratepayers' money could be applied for the improvement of the commons. The Committee further recommended the repeal of the Statute of Merton, on the ground that even in the agricultural districts, any attempt at inclosure of lands under the alleged authority of the statute would be entirely inconsistent with the more comprehensive legislation of the present day. The recommendation of the Committee with respect to the management of commons was afterwards adopted by Parliament and the Metropolitan Commons Act, under which some five or six commons had been placed under proper management. The Act was not without difficulties; but it would have been put into operation more frequently but for circumstances to which he should presently revert, and for the same reason the proposal to repeal the Statute of Merton was postponed. These circumstances were that immediately after the Report of the Committee there commenced a raid upon the commons near London of a most formidable character. Inclosures were made in all directions; 3,000 acres of Epping Forest were inclosed, and some 10 or 12 other commons were either inclosed or threatened. This led to a counter-demonstration. A society was formed for the purpose of resisting these inclosures, and to test the truth of the conclusions of the Committee of 1865, that inclosures were illegal and could be put down. Local committees were formed; public-spirited persons came forward; Mr. Augustus Smith sent 200 men to pull down the fences which had been erected by Earl Brownlow as lord of the manor. His hon. Friend the Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid) undertook to resist the inclosure of Plumstead, which had been made by an Oxford College. In Epping Forest the battle was fought for three or four years by a brave old labouring man named Willingale, assisted by friends of the cause. In all, some 10 or 12 suits were commenced, which occupied the Court of Chancery for many years. Ancient records were searched, manorial law was furnished up, and it was found that the old law of the country was quite equal to the task of putting down these illegalities. With one exception—that of Hampstead, where a compromise was effected by the Metropolitan Board purchasing the common for a comparatively small sum—all the cases were successful, and fully established the fact that the inclosures were as illegal as they were arbitrary and without consideration for the public. In the case of Epping Forest, the investigations of old Willingale's suit showed that the Corporation of London, as the owner of a cemetery, had rights of common over the whole forest. The Corporation, full of zeal for the public interest, was induced to put those rights in force, and it brought these suits, which ended only last year in the most complete victory, and in the practical restoration of 3,000 acres to the forest, and therefore to the use of the people. Pending these cases, he need hardly say that all questions of altering the law, or of repealing the Statute of Merton, were naturally suspended. But he thought the time had now come for a proper consideration of the question. They had practically shown that these inclosures were illegal; it was only a question of money. He felt confident that any inclosure could be put down. The question, however, arose whether the State should not interfere to prevent these arbitrary inclosures, to give greater protection against them, to stop useless litigation, to avoid the necessity of these circuitous actions, and to forbid all further encroachments, except such as received the sanction of Parliament, through the proper course of the Inclosure Commission. But of this he was confident—that no Bill would be satisfactory or lasting as a settlement of the question which did not deal with this matter by securing the public from these arbitrary and illegal inclosures. The second question he had to deal with was that affecting the regulation and management of commons, especially those within reach of populous places. The present Bill was very skilfully, he might say artfully drawn. It put in the foreground the clauses for the regulation and improvement of commons, and kept in the background the inclosure, and the Home Secretary, with perfect candour, told them that he hoped there would be many more applications for the one than the other. He wished he could think so; but he thought the right hon. Gentleman was under a delusion on that point. He knew it had been suggested by the Inclosure Commissioners that power should be taken to regulate commons; but he believed it to be an entire mistake to suppose that a lord of the manor would ever apply for the regulation of his common. What lords of manors wished to do was to inclose, and not regulate; if they could not get consent to inclose, they would not go to the expense of regulation. He would be told, however, that under the Bill local authorities would have power to initiate proceedings for regulating commons; but they must first get the consent of two-thirds of the persons interested, and as no scheme could be finally concluded without the approval of the lord of the manor, practically it came to this—that the scheme of the local authorities must necessarily be subject to the veto of the lord of the manor. That was a very poor substitute for the extension of the Metropolitan Commons Act to commons in other populous places. The true course was to extend the Metropolitan Commons Act to other populous places. With respect to the position of the agricultural labourer who was tenant of a cottage on a common, though he had strictly no legal right to the common, since such rights were attached to land only, and not to persons, still as long as the common remained open he exercised a right in lieu of the owner of the cottage which he occupied, and consequently was entitled to consideration. All that the Bill provided to meet such cases was that it removed a limit contained in the Act of 1845 in regard to the amount of land that was to be appropriated as garden allotments or recreation grounds upon an inclosure taking place. The Committee of 1871 recommended as a minimum that one-tenth of the common inclosed should be set apart for such purposes. Many at the time objected, on the ground that that minimum was excessive; on the other hand, others thought it too small. Looking back at the miserable pittance allowed for gardens in the Act of 1845 to agricultural labourers, where inclosures had occurred, he came to the conclusion that grave injustice had been done. The Bill proposed in future to leave the matter to the discretion of the Inclosure Commissioners. He had the greatest respect for these gentlemen; they had done their duty honestly and according to the instructions of Parliament; but the instincts of Inclosure Commissioners must necessarily be in favour of inclosure. For his own part, he did not desire to leave such matters entirely to the discretion of the Commissioners, and thought that it would be easier to lay down at least a minimum in the Bill. In conclusion, he would point out what appeared to be three grave defects in the Bill—1. It provided no remedy whatever against arbitrary inclosures, such as we had so many examples of, and, which, although they had been declared illegal after expensive and lengthy process of law, were certain to break out again. 2. It provided no adequate means for the regulation and improvement of commons within reach of populous places. 3. It did not sufficiently secure the interest of the labouring class in case of inclosure. Unless these defects were cured, the Bill would not be that lasting settlement which the Home Secretary desired, and which was equally in the interest of lords of manors, of commoners, and of the public. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House considers that the Bill does not provide sufficient facilities for the regulation and improvement of commons in their present open condition, and is of opinion that, after the recent decisions given in regard to Epping Forest and other cases, where inclosures have been illegally and arbitrarily made, no inclosures should be permitted except under the special sanction of Parliament,"—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre),—instead thereof.

MR. PEASE said, that as a Member of the Inclosure Committee of 1869 he had gone carefully through this Bill with the Report of that Committee, and so far as he could find out the Resolutions and Report of that Committee had been fairly and honestly brought forward in the Bill. So far as he could see the Bill was one which, after the Amendments it might undergo in Committee, would be a very great improvement on the present Inclosure Act—bearing in mind the principle that they were endeavouring to keep the commons open for public use, and to provide suitable recreation grounds and garden allotments for the agricultural poor. The hon. Gentleman had urged three objections against it. He alleged that it would not prevent inclosures; but he had, while admitting the efficacy of the means already available for that purpose, failed to specify the remedy he would substitute for it. The hon. Gentleman said proceedings in Chancery were attended with great expense, but where questions of land arose, it was impossible to deal with them without calling witnesses into Court; but when those proceedings had been taken, substantial justice had been obtained. The next point urged by the hon. Gentleman was that the regulations for the improvement of the commons would prove nugatory, as the consent of the lord of the manor would have to be obtained; but then, if the lord of the manor refused his consent, the common would remain as it was—still an open space. With respect to the privileges of agricultural labourers, his hon. Friend admitted that a great improvement in their position would be made by the Bill; for not only would they, so long as they tenanted their cottages, enjoy the garden allotments, but the Inclosure Commissioners would have power to pay the original expense of bringing the allotments into culture. His hon. Friend had talked of the rights of the agricultural labourers who might have occupied a cottage near a common for six months; but his hon. Friend would find it very difficult to give such a labourer the same rights as a freeholder. The conclusions from "Domesday Book" were anything but reliable, as he had found it very inaccurate in every instance in which he had had occasion to consult it, and he feared a great deal of money and of pains had been lavished upon it without producing any very good result. The Bill, so far as he could see, carried out the recommendations of the Committee, by whom great attention was given to the subject, was simple in its character, and was calculated to do a considerable amount of good.

MR. PELL observed, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had given the House a learned speech on the subject, which he had listened to with much interest. But he must take exception to what he said respecting public rights. If by that expression he meant the rights of the inhabitants of the vicinity of the common, he was ready to assent to his view. He thought, however, the expression might be interpreted to mean the rights of the public generally, though resident in places which might be very distant from the public locally interested. He (Mr. Pell) thought that the great feature of the Bill—the feature which ought to give the greatest satisfaction—was, that it made provision for keeping open within reasonable limits all the open spaces in the country. That was a result which could not fail to be productive of good. Another good point in the Bill was, that whilst it would thus reserve to the use of the people places of much natural beauty, where they could enjoy seasonable and healthful recreation, it would disabuse the minds of the people of the very great prejudice and misconception that they had indefinite rights and interests in the property of commons where they had no such rights whatsoever. As regarded the labourers, nothing the House could do for them would place them in the position they formerly enjoyed before they lost the advantages attending the ownership of common rights; but because the Bill did not do that for them, it was no reason why it should not still be accepted. He hoped that the hon. Member for Reading would not press his Motion to a division, because his speech contained nothing that was really hostile to the Bill.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, that his objection to the Bill rested not on what it contained, but on what it omitted. The Bill was satisfactory so far as it embodied a great number of recommendations which had been made by three Committees; but he hoped that when the Home Secretary introduced this Bill he would have made a full settlement of the question by complete provisions for dealing satisfactorily with the subject. The omission which he thought the most grave, and which he wished to see remedied, was that relating to suburban commons. The Bill maintained the principle of the Act of 1845, and amended the procedure and ensured a fuller consideration of the interests of the Commoners, but it entirely ignored the principle of the Metropolitan Commons Act, which had preserved for the enjoyment of the public so many open spaces. The preservation of commons in the immediate vicinity of towns would devolve upon Town Councils and local Government Boards. Those bodies would be the only safeguards. They would have power to appear before the Inclosure Commissioners or Assistant Commissioners; but might often omit to undertake that difficult task in cases where inclosure ought to be resisted. Many of the provisions of the Bill were ineffective for their intended purposes, and there was no guarantee that a larger portion of land would be appropriated for allotments or gardens for the working classes than under the existing law. He would ask, if this Bill was to provide a complete system for inclosing land, why the Government should not prevent inclosure by any other means? The Statute of Merton, which was unfitted to present circumstances, but was often abused, ought to be repealed. If this Bill could provide for a full and fair adjudication on all right and claims other modes of inclosure ought to be prohibited. In his opinion, the Bill would not be perfect unless it contained some indication as to the manner in which inclosures were henceforth to be made.

MR. SANDFORD feared that some portions of the speech of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would mislead the public; and for his own part, he approved of the decision of the Law Courts—that people should not simply by wandering over property gain a right to roam upon it habitually. The best legal opinion had arrived at the conclusion that the Statute of Merton was nothing more than a declaration of the common law, and, therefore, that would remain even were the statute repealed as suggested. The only practical objection which had been raised bore upon the difficulty, in point of expense, of resisting the encroachments of lords of the manor, and the hon. Gentleman had spoken of the advantage arising in the case of Epping Forest from the Corporation of London happening to have a locus standi; yet when he (Mr. Sandford) proposed, in the Committee of 1865, that power should be given to the Metropolitan Board of Works of purchasing manorial or commoners' rights in the neighbourhood of London, so as to give them a locus standi, that suggestion was resisted by the hon.

Member himself. [Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE dissented.] Let the hon. Member turn to the record of the proceedings—how his Motion was lost by only a small majority. In justice to the Members of the Committee who voted against him, however, he might say he believed they did not very well know what they were objecting to. He intended, in Committee on the Bill, to raise the question whether it would not be beneficial to give corporations of large towns power to purchase some commoners or manorial rights in their neighbourhood for the purpose of giving them a locus standi for the preservation of commons. As for the Amendment, it was hardly worth while, in his opinion, to divide the House upon it, for it did not assert any principle which might not be brought forward in Committee. He had the greatest confidence in the Home Secretary. During an experience of that House, extending over a quarter of a century, he had never known a right hon. Gentleman make himself so thoroughly master of the subjects with which he had to deal as the right hon. Gentleman, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would cordially agree to any practicable suggestion for further protecting the rights of commoners. The appointment of a Standing Committee was a most important matter. It appeared to him that the whole protection of the public depended upon that, and he hoped the Committee would be formed of the most independent Members. If the appointment of that Committee were entrusted to the Committee of Selection or left in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman himself, he should be perfectly content.

Mr. FAWCETT said, a remark of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) threw light on this difficult and complicated Bill. The hon. Member said there were notions abroad that people living in large towns away from commons had a right to wander over those commons, and those notions he described as monstrous. The hon. Member said the object of this Bill was to restrain that right. He could not have more happily described the contents of this Bill. He (Mr. Fawcett) contended that those commons, although nominally belonging to lords of manors and commoners, were a great and valuable possession to be enjoyed not by the people in the particular locality, but by the people of the entire country, who liked to wander to those commons to see beautiful scenery or seek for recreation, health, and fresh air. If it was not the intention, it certainly would be the result of this Bill, if it passed as it stood, to curtail the rights which the entire people now possessed in the comparatively few open spaces which remained to us. When the Home Secretary rose to reply he hoped he would reply to the interpretation which had been put on his measure by one of his own supporters. He (Mr. Fawcett) had no wish to cast the smallest suspicion on the intentions of the Home Secretary. He read carefully the speech of the Home Secretary on the Motion for leave to introduce this Bill, but he was glad he was not in the House when that speech was delivered; because, captivated by the admirable sentiments of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he might have committed the mistake of expressing approval of a Bill, simply from the speech by which it was introduced. Nothing could be more admirable than the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, who had, no doubt, intended that his speech should carry out the sentiments of his Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman could prove that the Bill would carry out what he said in his speech, he would find no more cordial supporter than he (Mr. Fawcett) would be. The central point of his speech was that he wished these open spaces to be preserved for the enjoyment of the public. He did not say anything about the monstrous idea of the public having any rights in commons. He (Mr. Fawcett) had read this Bill with the greatest care, and to aid him in the reading of it he called in a high legal authority. They had put the best interpretation on the Bill they could, and they had come to these conclusions—first, that the Bill provided no adequate security that the rights of the rural poor and of the public in rural districts would be adequately secured in the future; secondly, that the Bill provided no security that commons in the neighbourhood of populous towns would not be inclosed; thirdly, that as it stood the Bill rendered all those clauses which read so remarkably well with regard to the regulation of commons in the neighbourhood of towns inoperative; fourthly, the Bill continued to place confidence in a body of men—he spoke of them not personally but officially—in whom no confidence ought to be placed—namely, the Inclosure Commissioners, under whom, during the last 20 years, 400,000 acres had been inclosed, leaving only 2,000 acres for the poor, and 2,000 acres for public purposes. Yet everything was left to the mercy of the Inclosure Commissioners. If the Inclosure Commissioners had acted in the spirit of the speech of the Home Secretary the monstrous abuses that had been committed in the past would never have arisen, and there would be no necessity for this legislation. Looking at the conduct of the Commissioners in the past, it would be extremely rash not to tie them down more expressly by that Bill in the future. With reference to the rural poor, this Bill gave no security whatever that, in the case of any particular inclosure, an adequate amount of land would be reserved. It might be said that every one of the Provisional Orders would be submitted to Parliament, and that, if the reservation was inadequate, Parliament might reject the Provisional Orders. But they had experienced how difficult it was to overthrow a place of this kind, and they knew how ready both officials and ex-officials were to defend the policy of the Department. A recommendation was made that, in cases of inclosure, a minimum should be retained for necessary purposes. He wanted to know why that recommendation should be left out of the Bill. He believed that in the Committee which considered this question no one took a more active part than the present Secretary to the Treasury, who, indeed, if his memory did not greatly deceive him, constantly insisted on the importance of inserting in an Act of Parliament a minimum reservation of that kind. Again, every Member of the Committee would acknowledge that no conclusion was more forced upon them than that one of the most fruitful sources of injustice to the rural poor arose from the fact that whenever the Assistant Commissioner went down to a place to hold an inquiry he held it at 11 or 12 o'clock, or at an hour of the day when the poor were at work and could not possibly attend to state their objections. The inquiry usually lasted a very short time, and consisted of the hearing of an application for an inclosure, perhaps from a large landowner and the clergyman of the parish. Scarcely was there an instance brought under the Committee's notice in which the inquiry was held at such a time as gave the agricultural labourer a chance of attending. He thought all that would have been remedied by the present measure. The Bill said the inquiry should be held at a "suitable time." Suitable to whom? To the landowner, or to the Assistant Commissioner himself? It did not say it was to be suitable to the poor. When they knew that these inquiries had been, so far as concerned the rural poor, an idle mockery and a farce, surely the Assistant Commissioners ought to be tied down by much more stringent provisions than those of that Bill. But the measure was still more incomplete in regard to suburban commons. The Metropolitan Commons Act of 1865 had worked admirably for the advantage of the people of London; and no argument had been advanced to show why the people of Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and all our other great centres of population having commons in their neighbourhood should not have the same securities given to them in that matter as were enjoyed by the inhabitants of that metropolis. There was no great city in England which in proportion to its population was so well supplied as London with open spaces; and the loss of, perhaps, the only common near Manchester, Leeds, or Sheffield would be a greater injury to the inhabitants than the loss of a single common might be to the people of London. The Metropolitan Commons Act had worked so satisfactorily that any proposal to repeal it would not be entertained; and why should not privileges similar to those secured by it be conferred upon the populations of other large towns? If the proposed regulations of the Bill were likely to come into force, nothing would be better; but there was scarcely any chance that the clauses would prove operative, because a local authority could not obtain the confirmation of a scheme without the concurrence of two-thirds of those pecuniarily interested, and of the lord of the manor. Unless the Home Secretary was prepared to make radical changes in the Bill it would prove practically inoperative. Its clauses were vitiated, because it intrusted powers to Commissioners as if they had acted in the past on what the Home Secretary declared to be the principle of the Bill, whereas they had acted on exactly the opposite principle. In spite of all warnings and expressions of public opinion, they had done everything in their power to facilitate inclosure and to reserve a minimum quantity of land for recreation and for the poor; and it was this policy which it was the professed object of the Bill, and should be the desire of Parliament, to reverse. Indeed, the Bill did not repeal the Preamble of the Act of 1845, which laid down the principle on which the Commissioners were bound to act, and that was that it was desirable to facilitate the inclosure of land. But what the Home Secretary wished to do in future was not to facilitate, but to retard inclosure; and therefore his Bill ought to be based upon an entirely different principle from the unrepealed Preamble of the Act of 1845. If there had been a simple clause in the Bill that no inclosure should take place in future, except with the authority of Parliament, that would have produced a powerful effect. He knew now an instance of a common of which a few years ago not a single acre was inclosed; but every autumn lately when he had visited it there were 50 or 100 acres inclosed, and the commoners could not take any steps to resist it because a suit would cost from £1,500 to £2,000. This was not justice. It was a scandal which the House had power to prevent. Thousands of acres of land were being inclosed in this illegal and arbitrary manner. How had any illegal inclosure been prevented but by the public spirit of some influential person in the neighbourhood, who was willing to go to the expense of a law suit?—and the commons should no longer be left in such a state of insecurity. He should support the Resolution of the hon. Member for Reading, if it was carried to a division. But he hoped it would not be pressed, as he believed that the Home Secretary wished the Bill to be a good one, and that no doubt if it could be shown that the measure did not carry out his intentions the right hon. Gentleman would alter it.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought that the hon. Member (Mr. Fawcett) seemed to have argued in a circle. The Home Secretary, in this Bill, had recognized, to a greater extent than had ever been recognized before, the public rights, and the Bill contained great limitations upon the rights of owners, and also upon the Inclosure Commissioners. The objections that had been made against the Bill were groundless, and he believed that it would effect every object that could be desired.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had nothing to complain of with regard to the manner in which the Motion which stood in the name of his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had been brought forward; but he must complain that the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had made statements inconsistent with the tenour and terms of the Bill. He did not think he was exceeding the bounds of Parliamentary language when he said that a more unjust and ungenerous description of the measure it would be absolutely impossible to give. He would mention two instances in order to show how unfair the hon. Member for Hackney had been. The hon. Member said no provision was made by the Bill to secure the attendance of persons who ought to be present, and that the Assistant Commissioner would soon be able to do as he pleased. No doubt, unintentionally, the hon. Gentleman had misread three lines of the Bill. The hon. Member said the Bill provided that the Assistant Commissioner appointed to hold the inquiry should inspect the common, and should convene a public meeting at a suitable time and place; but there the hon. Member stopped, not completing the clause, which stated that the object was to "secure the attendance of the neighbouring inhabitants and of all persons interested," and yet the hon. Member maintained that the Assistant Commissioner would still be able to do exactly as he liked. Again, the hon. Member for Hackney had made a most unfair attack on the Inclosure Commissioners, asserting that they had acted in an unjust and unfair spirit in the interests of the lords of the manor and against the interests of the poor. The hon. Member added that they would do precisely the same under this Bill, as the Government had left everything entirely to their discretion. He must remind the hon. Member for Hackney of a speech which he made in Parliament two or three years ago on this subject. The hon. Gentleman stated at that time that he was not opposed to inclosures; but that what he wanted to have distinently laid down was that each particular scheme should be submitted to a Committee of this House. What was the meaning of that speech? It was that the discretion should be taken away from the Inclosure Commissioners and the matter brought to this House for decision. But what did this Bill propose? The very scheme, the very framework of the Bill was to take away from the discretion of the Commissioners what to a very great extent was left to them before, and to bring every scheme, with all particulars connected with it, and all the objections to it, under the notice of Parliament. He repeated, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman's description was a total perversion of the terms of the Bill. One object of the Bill was not to have a hard-and-fast line drawn in any special case; but in every case to come for the decision of Parliament, taking care that Parliament should have full and ample information. The other object of the Bill was to prevent, as far as possible, the inclosure of commons and to give facilities for keeping them open for the benefit of the people, so that not only those having rights in these commons should enjoy those rights, but that the people enjoying the use, they had hitherto had of these commons, might have them improved, drained, and levelled for their enjoyment. The House would remember the old rhyme—

"The law condemns the man and woman
Who steal the goose from off the common;
But does not punish what's far worse,
To steal the common from the goose."

He had no intention of stealing a common from any goose, but to give every facility for the continued user by the poor labourer, the artizan, and the dweller in large towns of that beautiful scenery which they had hitherto enjoyed, but in an improved state.

MR. WHITWELL asked that the Committee should be postponed to as long a period as possible, in order to give the country time to consider the provisions of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

CIVIL BILL COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET), in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the Courts for hearing Civil Bill causes in Ireland, and for other purposes; said, it was a very important Bill to the people of Ireland. At present a Common Law jurisdiction was enjoyed by the Civil Bill Courts except in cases of libel, slander, breach of promise of marriage, and criminal conversation, to the limit of £40, and he now proposed to extend that jurisdiction to £50. He also proposed to give an equitable jurisdiction to those Courts. As regarded Admiralty cases, he hoped to deal with them by another Bill which he would lay before the House in a few days. The Government did not propose to deal with administration of the law of bankruptcy at present. This Bill was founded upon the English Act of 1865; but whereas the English Bill was limited to cases of £500, including personalty and realty, this Bill would be limited to £500 personalty, and also include realty to the value of £30 a-year. With regard to the testamentary causes the Bill proposed that the Chairman of the county, in those cases in which he was satisfied on affidavit that the deceased person had his last place of abode within the county, and that his personal property did not exceed £500, or his real property the annual value of £30, should have original jurisdiction. The salaries of Chairmen of counties would not be increased in consideration of the extra duties thus imposed upon them, but would be charged upon the Consolidated Fund, and travelling expenses would be allowed. It was proposed that the Chairmen of counties hereafter appointed should not be permitted to practise at the Bar, and that in future equal pay and, as nearly as possible, equal work would be given to all of them. For it was intended that the second and third-class Chairmanships should be gradually abolished; and finally, by the re-arrangement of districts, their number should be reduced from 33 to 21. By a separate Bill the offices of Clerk of the Peace and Clerk of the Crown would be united.

Mr. MELDON expressed a general approval of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the Courts for hearing Civil Bill Causes in Ireland; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND and Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Bill to enable legally qualified Medical Practitioners to hold certain public medical appointments, and to amend the Medical Act, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GIBSON, Dr. CAMERON, Mr. MULHOLLAND, and Dr. WARD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 81.]

GRAND JURY LAWS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. KAVANAGH, Bill to amend the Grand Jury Laws of Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. KAVANAGH, Mr. GIBSON, Mr. ORMSBY GORE, and Mr. MULHOLLAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 80.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock, till Monday next.

CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS.

QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET rose to ask Her Majesty's Government a Question on the subject of Chain Cables and Anchors, and said that he had placed this Notice on the Paper because in reading in the newspapers the accounts of the voyage of the Prince of Wales, he had been struck—and he thought their Lordships must have been struck—by the remarkable fact that the Serapis, in which His Royal Highness was embarked, appeared to have been supplied with very bad ground tackle. Her anchors and chains had given way on more than one occasion. He understood that, in the Piræus, both cables broke, she lost two anchors, and she was carried against the Osborne, to the injury of both vessels. Again, when the Serapis arrived on the coast of India one of her anchors gave way, and she drifted at considerable risk. Now these circumstances in connection with this vessel appeared so singular that he had been induced to ask how it came about that her cables and anchors should be so bad. With regard to the way in which anchors were supplied to the Navy, their Lordships were aware that several kinds of anchors had been from time to time submitted to the Admiralty. Among them were Porter's, of which they had heard a great deal; Trotman's, of which much had been heard in the Lobby of the House of Commons; Rogers's, and Martin's which a great many naval officers preferred. He wanted to know how many firms now supplied anchors to the Admiralty? Formerly the Department contracted for anchors only with firms of well-known reputation: but it was said that, from motives of supposed economy, there was less precaution now in that respect, and that, as a consequence, some of the anchors supplied for Her Majesty's ships were of inferior quality. The turret ships were supplied with Martin's anchors; but it was said that, though the Captain of the Serapis had applied for Martin's, he was not supplied with them, but with anchors of an inferior description. He wished for information on that point; and also as to the test applied to anchors used in the Navy. With respect to chain cables, he should like some information of a similar character. Formerly, the whole of a cable was tested by the Admiralty by subjecting it to a very severe strain in excess of what it was likely to have to endure when being worked in a ship; but when he was at the Admiralty it was thought that such a system of test was not a good one, as it was calculated to injure the fibres of the material in the cables which stood it. On that account it was considered better to take out a few links here and there and subject them to a very severe test, even at the risk of breaking links of ordinary strength. There were objections to both systems; and probably the best security we could have in respect both of anchors and cables was to contract for them only with firms of established reputation. He wished to ask Her Majesty's Government, Under what system the Admiralty procure chain cables and anchors for Her Majesty's ships; and what is the mode of testing now adopted; also, whether the rumours of the failure of the chain cables in the voyage of the Serapis are true or false?

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he was informed that when, in the harbour of the Piræus, the Serapis was about to take up the berth which had been assigned to her, owing to some mistake or other—probably to one arising from a mistake as to the language used—she overshot the mark. When this was perceived she was brought up suddenly, and the cable snapped. A link was taken out of it and sent to England, and it proved to be of good iron. Before the Serapis started her cables had been tested and were reported to be composed of the very best materials:—a link that was found to be bad was taken out at Portsmouth. The regulations for testing required that so many links in a length of chain cable should be subjected to a severe test. The anchors also were submitted to tests laid down in Regulations. In fact, every possible care was taken to ascertain that both anchors and cables were trustworthy; and he could not find that any accident similar to the one he had just referred to had occurred to the Serapis on any of her previous trips. As to Martin's anchors, they were only served out to the largest class of ships.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET wished to remark that Martin's anchors were used in the Navies of almost all other nations. They were adopted by France, by Germany, by Austria, by Italy, by America, and they were supplied to all our large iron-clads and turret-ships. Why should the other ships of the Navy have anchors inferior to those used generally by so many other nations and by our own iron-clads?

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, that the character of the bottom on which the anchor was let go had very much to do with the matter. He believed there was no test of either chain cables or anchors in the Merchant Service, and such a state of things was very dangerous.

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, that, from information received here, it would appear that the breaking of the anchor of the Serapis was caused by the anchor being dropped on a rocky bottom. Ships like the Serapis were built by contract, and their anchors and cables were supplied by contract; but the Admiralty subjected both the latter to the tests referred to by his noble Friend who had answered the Question of the noble Duke.

METROPOLIS—TRAFFIC AT HYDE PARK CORNER.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD wished to put a Question to Her Majesty's Government upon a subject of interest to the convenience of those who lived in and those who visited London. He referred to some plan being adopted to relieve the pressure of the traffic at Hyde Park Corner, which for at least six months of the year was excessive. He believed that several Governments had from time to time considered the propriety of relieving this pressure by making a new road across the Green Park at some point between Park Lane and Apsley House, but it remained for the present officials at the Board of Works to propose, as they did last year, a feasible and popular plan. They set to work in a very business-like way; a model was prepared by direction of the Chief Commissioner of Works; it was exhibited in one of the Committee Rooms of the House of Commons last Session, the opinion and criticisms of both Houses were invited to the subject, and if he might judge from the tenour of the language held by his noble Friends the Chief Commissioner of Public Works in the House of Commons, and the noble Duke the Lord President in their Lordships' House, the Government had every reason to be satisfied with the reception given to their scheme. On the 7th of June last year Lord Henry Lennox, in reply to a Question from Lord Ernest Bruce, said—

“From the tenour of the noble Lord's Question, I hope I may consider that he approves the scheme for relieving the traffic at Hyde Park Corner, which is pointed out in the model now exhibiting in the Conference-room; and I am happy to assure the noble Lord that the drawings are all ready, and that as soon as the scheme has been approved by the House of Commons the road will be commenced at once.”—[3 Hansard, cccxiv. 1461.]

On the 2nd of July, 1875, the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), in reply to Lord Redesdale, said—

The Duke of Somerset

"He believed that the model which had been placed in a Committee-room of the other House had been very generally approved. It was thought that the execution of the plan would afford the relief to the traffic which was no doubt required. As soon as the model had been finally approved and adopted it was the intention of the Government, before the end of the Session, to take a Vote for the purpose of making the road, which would be commenced in the autumn, and he hoped that at an early period next year it would be opened to the public."—[3 Hansard, ccxxv. 869.]

The Estimate was voted to the amount of £5,000 for this object on the 4th of August. After these declarations he was afraid some disappointment would be felt at nothing having been done, but he trusted their Lordships would hear to-night that this necessary metropolitan improvement, though unluckily postponed, had not been finally abandoned. He begged to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether, in accordance with the statements made in both Houses of Parliament during the Session of 1875, the new road across the Green Park, to relieve the traffic at Hyde Park Corner, would be commenced and completed with the least possible delay?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in reply to the Question of his noble Friend, had to say that his noble Friend was perfectly correct as to what occurred last year. Speaking from the information derived from the Department of Works, he believed, when he spoke last year, that the new road would be carried out, with the result of affording considerable relief to the traffic at Hyde Park Corner. But at the end of last Session the attention of his noble Relative the First Commissioner of Works was called to certain objections to, and defects in, the plan, which objections and defects had up to that time escaped notice. When, however, from a personal inspection, he satisfied himself that they did exist, he thought it better to defer for another year any actual steps in the way of opening a road rather than run the risk of carrying out a faulty plan. Since then several other plans had been under consideration, but up to this time no satisfactory solution of the difficulty had been come to on the subject.

THE EARL OF POWIS thought that, though the plan of last year might be open to objection, yet a satisfactory road might be made on the lines of the plan

if certain modifications were adopted. He thought, for instance, that the scheme of a sub-way under Constitution Hill might be re-considered. A survey made by the Woods and Forests in 1857 showed that without any disturbance of the gradient a head-way of 9 feet or 10 feet might be obtained, which would be sufficient for most of the traffic, as it would suffice for broughams, cabs, and open carriages.

LORD HAMPTON observed that the noble Duke had not stated what were the objections to, and defects in, the plan of last year. He believed the sub-way was the true mode of meeting the difficulties of the case.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, the real difficulty was this—they could not run one flow of traffic across another without causing a block. Down from Hamilton Place and Park Lane there would be a flow of traffic which must cross the great traffic along Piccadilly. The traffic in that part of London—both the traffic coming down from the direction of Oxford Street and that along the line of Piccadilly itself—had enormously increased of late years. He knew that a sub-way was open to certain objections because of its interference with the course of sewers and gas mains, but he had a firm conviction that it was the only solution of the question.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON SCIENTIFIC INSTRUCTION.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government has considered the recommendations of the Commission for Scientific Instruction and for the Advancement of Science; and, whether they propose in the present Session to introduce measures for carrying out any of those recommendations?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the recommendations of the Commission in question had been for some time under the consideration of the Government. With reference to what steps the Government proposed to take in the matter, he would rather not anticipate the statement which it would be the duty of his noble Friend the Vice President of the Council to make on the subject.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON RAILWAYS. QUESTION.

MR. ELLIOT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill, or take any other steps this Session, with a view to the prevention of accidents on Railways; and, if not, whether the Government will be prepared to support any well considered measure having for its object the regulation of the hours of labour of signalmen, engine drivers, pointsmen, and other responsible persons employed on Railways, so as to ensure the better safety of the travelling public?

MR. DISRAELI: The Government, Sir, are awaiting with interest, I may say with anxiety, the Report of the Royal Commission on Railways. At present that Commission is pursuing its inquiries in Ireland. The inquiries of the Commission have been to some degree retarded by the loss of the noble Duke the Duke of Buckingham, the President of the Commission, who devoted his time entirely to this important subject; but I hope the Report will be presented to the House, though I fear not before Easter, in time to consider it with a view to legislation. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to take any immediate steps in the way of legislation.

PUBLIC HEALTH—TYPHOID FEVER AT EAGLEY.—QUESTION.

MR. CHARLEY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the recent fatal outbreak of typhoid fever at Eagley, near Bolton, in Lancashire, which is attributed by the Medical Officer of Health to the pollution of milk by water filled with sewage, used for washing the milk cans; and, whether, in view of the numerous and fatal outbreaks of a similar kind in Islington, Marylebone, Glasgow, Jarrow, and other places, which have been, after due investigation, attributed to a similar pollution of the milk supply, he will consider the expediency of introducing a measure for the protection of health by special sanitary supervision of dairy farms, and of the premises in which milk is stored prior to sale by urban milk vendors?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Immediately, Sir, after hearing of the lamentable outbreak of fever at Eagley, I directed that communications should be addressed to the sanitary authorities of that place and of Bolton, from whom I have received all the information at present available on the subject, and which is, I am sorry to say, of a deplorable character. Although there has been no inquiry of a definitive or exhaustive character, two somewhat contradictory facts seem to come out—first, that the milk, although poor in quality, was not adulterated; and, secondly, that the milk-cans were undoubtedly washed with water from a highly-polluted source. I do not at present see my way to introduce a measure for the supervision of dairy farms and other such premises; but I think it quite possible that regulations might be enforced by bye-laws or otherwise for their better regulation, and the subject will have my attention.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE—DUNGENESS. QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, considering the constant loss of life and property inside the point of Dungeness, and the insecurity of that part of the coast of England, the Government propose to advise the construction of a safety harbour and of works of defence at or near Dungeness?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: There is no intention, Sir, of advising the expenditure of public money in the construction of a harbour of refuge at Dungeness. An improvement in the lighting of the point was made at the beginning of the present winter by the addition of a second light at the extreme edge of the shore, as it was found that the beach was growing out. There is also a powerful fog signal at the point. As to any works of defence at Dungeness, it is not a matter in my Department. I can only say I have heard of no such proposal. As to the constant loss of life inside the point, a Question was put to me by the hon. Member last year assuming that in the six miles between Romney and Dungeness 20 vessels were stranded every year. This number, on a Return being made, appeared to be greatly exaggerated—being six instead of 20 wrecks, as stated.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN gave Notice that, in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's answer, he would call attention to the subject on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—HIGHER DIVISION OF CLERKS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to act upon that portion of the Report of the Civil Service Inquiry Commission which relates to the establishment of a higher division of Civil Service Clerks; and, if so, when it is probable that the arrangement for giving effect to it will be made?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had stated on a former night that it was not the intention of the Government to issue any such general order as that referred to in the Question; but that they were prepared to deal with the Departments of the Civil Service separately with reference to the subject.

JURY LAW—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to amend the Jury Law this Session, or if the subject is under the consideration of the Government?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General stated a few days ago that it was the intention of the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor to introduce a Bill this Session to amend the Jury Laws.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES. QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there is any foundation for the statement which has appeared in the public journals, that the English fishermen on the coast of Newfoundland have destroyed "the engines" of the French fishermen; and, whether, in consequence, the Government of the island has asked for an additional naval force?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, he was not aware to what particular incident the first part of the hon. Gentleman's Question referred; but in the early part of last year a case occurred in which a British fisherman was alleged to have destroyed a salmon weir placed in a river by a Frenchman ; since which, however, no similar proceedings had, so far as he (Mr. J. Lowther) knew, occurred. With regard to the latter part of the Question, he might state that no application had been received for an increased naval force to be stationed in the waters in which there were disputed rights of fishing.

BANKS OF ISSUE—RE-APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he intends to move for the re-appointment of the Committee on Banks of Issue ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, a Committee sat last Session on Banks of Issue, and took a great deal of evidence, but there was not time to consider the Report. They therefore reported the evidence to the House, and recommended that they should be re-appointed during the present Session for the purpose of drawing up a Report upon the evidence. He was not at present able to say what course the Government might take with regard to the question whether they should recommend a re-appointment or not. He hoped, in a short time, to be able to give an answer.

ARMY — KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

MR. R. YORKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government Plans for the re-erection of Knightsbridge Barracks on their present site will be placed upon the Table of the House in sufficient time to admit of their careful consideration before the Estimates are brought on ; if he could state to the House whether more land would be added to the site, and, if so, how much, on what side, and at what cost ; and, to what extent, according to the Government Plan, will the Knightsbridge Road be widened ?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, it was intended by the Government, if the House should assent, that Knightsbridge Barracks should be re-constructed on their present site. It was intended also, and negotiations were now going on for that purpose, to buy some land in the neighbourhood, but he did not intend to say exactly where, while the negotiations were going on. The Knightsbridge Road, according to the Government Plan, would be considerably widened, for it would be 60ft. wide including footways, which he hoped would be an improvement to the district.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he contemplates introducing into Parliament this Session a Public Prosecutors Bill ?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was quite prepared to bring in a Bill on the subject, if a fitting opportunity offered—that was to say, if the other Business of the Session permitted.

ARMY—MOBILIZATION OF ARMY

CORPS.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any intention of mobilizing any of the Army Corps during the present year ?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: It is the intention, Sir, of the War Department to mobilize two of the Army Corps, unless some objection intervenes, of which at present we know nothing.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. DUNBAR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been drawn to the penultimate paragraph of the last Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, wherein they state that the scheme of the Civil Service Inquiry Commission is applicable to their Department, and can be carried into effect "with a large saving, even after taking into consideration a very liberal scale of compensation to those retiring from office ;" and, whether he proposes to authorize the Commissioners to proceed with the reconstruction of the Department under their control accordingly ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was aware of the opinion expressed by the Inland Revenue Commissioners on the point in question, and the Government was at present in communication with the Board of Inland Revenue on the subject.

Mr. J. Lowther

OF NAUTICAL TERMS.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON (for Mr. GRIEVE) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been directed to the confusion, and consequently enhanced risk of collision at sea, from many Continental Maritime States interpreting the English nautical terms "port" and "starboard" as severally indicating the opposite action of the rudder to those understood by our navigators, as directed by Act of Parliament; and, if he will endeavour to bring about the adoption of uniformity of practice?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the Question was one which ought to have been addressed to the President of the Board of Trade, from whom, however, he had ascertained that there had been a Committee sitting on that subject for some time, composed of representatives of the Trinity House, the Admiralty, and the Board of Trade. Papers on the subject would be laid on the Table in a few days.

THE REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the new Medical Regulations for the Reserve Forces, promised in 1874 and 1875, have yet been issued, and whether under them it is proposed to retain the services of the Militia Surgeons; and, if so, upon what terms; and, what compensation is to be granted to those Surgeons of Militia who, although in good health and able to discharge all duties required of them, have received notice to resign their commissions under Part 15, Clause 9, Militia Regulations, dated the 28th day of May 1872.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the Regulations had not yet been issued by the War Office, but would be very shortly. It was proposed to retain the services of the Militia surgeons under conditions which would be published. As to the last part of the Question, no surgeons of Militia in good health and able to discharge all duties required of them had received notice to resign their commissions under the circular referred to.

DEATHS — MEDICAL CERTIFICATES.
QUESTION.

MR. WADDY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the statement in Dr. Ballard's Report to the Local Government Board, bearing date August 1872, that the statistics of the cause of death are seriously vitiated by the registrars receiving information as to the cause of death from unqualified practitioners; that of 196 persons dying of epidemic diseases in the sub-district of Tunstall (Staffordshire Potteries), 86 had been attended by unqualified practitioners, who gave certificates of death, a considerable number of the deaths recorded from "fever" being really due, in the opinion of Dr. Ballard, to scarlet fever; whether his attention has also been drawn to the similar statement in Dr. Ballard's Report to the Local Government Board, dated September 1875, on the sanitary condition of the registration sub-district of Oldbury, that of 511 deaths from epidemic diseases in five years, 221 were certified, as to the cause of death, by unqualified practitioners; and, whether the regulations of the Home Office allow the practice on the part of registrars of entering causes of death from certificates of unqualified persons, and of registering deaths so certified, without the authority of the coroner of the district; if not (the rule being in Judicial and Government offices to recognise registered practitioners alone for legal and formal purposes as qualified practitioners), under whose authority do the registrars act, and to what extent is this practice pursued; and is the Home Office prepared to interfere and put a stop to a practice not only misleading but dangerous?

MR. SCLATER-BOTH: I had occasion to consider the questions raised by the hon. and learned Member when engaged in preparing and passing through Parliament the Registration Act of 1874. It is true that in reporting on the sanitary condition of Tunstall in 1872 Dr. Ballard complained that the statistical results of the register were rendered unreliable, partly from the absence of certificates and partly because the persons whose deaths were the subject-matter of his inquiry were attended by unqualified persons. His Report as to Oldbury in 1875 was also to the effect quoted; but it is not strictly accurate to make use of the word "certificate" in reference to these entries. There is no certificate of death recognized by the Registration Act except that of a registered medical practitioner. Causes of death where there is no such certificate are registered in accordance with instructions issued by the Registrar General, and there are many cases of death where there is no certificate, and in respect of which there would be no ground for application to the Coroner. The regulations are as follow:—

"Unregistered Practitioners.—Any formal certificate or written statement of the cause of death furnished by an unregistered assistant of a registered practitioner, or by a qualified but unregistered practitioner, or by an irregular practitioner—ex. gr., 'bone-setter,' 'herbalist,' &c.—and produced to the Registrar, must be regarded by him simply as part of the information tendered by the informant of the death, who must take the responsibility of adopting the statement of the cause of death so furnished. In such cases nothing beyond the cause of death must be entered in Column 6, no reference whatever being made to the fact that the information was obtained from any formal or written document, and the name of person signing such document must on no account be recorded in the register."

It must be observed that Parliament has only insisted on a "certificate" in cases where a registered medical practitioner has been in attendance, and that there is no law prohibiting the employment of unregistered practitioners.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—THE LAND PURCHASE ACT, 1875.—QUESTION.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, When the Papers promised at the end of last Session in reference to the Prince Edward Island Land Question will be laid upon the Table of the House; whether he will include in these Papers a copy of "The Land Purchase Act, 1875;" the Report of the Commission; and the awards made to proprietors under that Act; and, whether he can give any information as to a reported decision of the Supreme Court of Judicature of the Island declaring some of these awards to be invalid?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, that the Papers relating to the subject were ready, and would be distributed at once. They would include the Land Purchase Act, 1875, but no Report by the Commissioners had yet been received. With regard to a decision alleged to have been given by the Supreme Court of the Island as to the invalidity of some of the awards, no official information had been received, but information on the subject was being procured from the Governor General. He must remind his hon. Friend, as an explanation of the absence of official information on that question, that the matters referred to did not come directly under the supervision of the Secretary of State, owing to Prince Edward Island now forming a portion of the Dominion of Canada.

CONSTABULARY (IRELAND)—CASE OF JAMES BRANNIGAN.—QUESTION.

MR. BENJAMIN WHITWORTH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can inform the House why sub-constable James Brannigan was discharged from the Royal Irish Constabulary on the 17th of June last, no reason having been assigned for such dismissal?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: James Brannigan, Sir, was in the employment of the Post Office. He resigned his place before an inquiry instituted against him for neglect of duty had been concluded, and, proceeding to Dublin, entered the Constabulary. The Post Office authorities subsequently informed the Inspector General of Constabulary that Brannigan's resignation had not been accepted, but that he had been recorded as dismissed. As it is an invariable rule that no man dismissed from one public Department shall be admitted to another, his discharge from the Constabulary was absolutely necessary.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE WYNN ELLIS BEQUEST.—QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Legacy of Pictures bequeathed to the Nation by Mr. Wynn Ellis has been accepted by the Trustees of the National Gallery; and, if so, when the Pictures will be open for public inspection?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that the legacy bequeathed by Mr. Wynn Ellis had been accepted by the Trustees of the National Gallery, and the pictures would be exhibited to the public when the new rooms now in course of construction at the National Gallery were finished; but it would probably be some two or three months before the arrangement of the pictures, which the new building rendered necessary, would permit of their being shown.

PROTECTION OF LIFE AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1871—COUNTY OF MEATH.—QUESTION.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has had under his consideration the desirability of relieving from the provisions of the Protection of Life and Property in certain parts of Ireland Act, 1871, those portions of the County Meath now subject to its provisions?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he had had that matter under his careful consideration, and he had not hitherto been able to advise the Lord Lieutenant to relieve the county of Meath from the operation of the Act in question. The hon. Gentleman, however, might rest assured that the Government were anxious, as soon as it could prudently be done, to give the relief to which he referred.

WEST AFRICA—ALLEGED TRANSFER OF TERRITORY—THE GAMBIA SETTLEMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN W. M'ARTHUR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is able to state to the House what course the Government propose to take with regard to the fulfilment of their pledge on the subject of the cession of Gambia?

MR. DISRAELI: In fulfilment of a pledge in reference to the Gambia, and in unison with the observations that were made in the other House by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Government have resolved to propose the appointment of a Select Committee on the question.

THE SUEZ CANAL—ENGLISH REPRESENTATIVES.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the following words in his published speech on the purchase of the Khedive's shares—namely—

"Arrangements are in progress which we hope will lead to . . . the introduction into the administration of the Company of three representatives of England,"— refer to an election of three out of the twenty-one members of Council, or of three out of the four members of the Committee of Management?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am unable to give a categorical answer to the Question of my noble Friend. There are, as he states, a Council of Administration and a Committee of Management in connection with the Suez Canal. It would be impossible for any arrangement to be made for the admission of three or any other number of members named by England into one or other of those bodies, unless by an alteration of the statutes moved at a general meeting with the approval of the Khedive. We hope to introduce three gentlemen into the administration of the Company. We have reason to believe that M. Lesseps has recommended an arrangement which has the approval of the present Council of Administration, and also the provisional approval of the Khedive; but what that arrangement precisely is, I am not at present in a position to state.

THE SUGAR CONVENTION, 1864—HOLLAND.—QUESTION.

In reply to MR. RITCHIE,

MR. BOURKE said, that, although doubts had been expressed as to the Dutch Chambers ratifying the Sugar Convention, owing to the opposition of the Dutch sugar refiners, it appeared by the last reports from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague that there were strong hopes of the difficulties in the way of the ratification being overcome. As the Convention had been accepted by the French and Belgian Assemblies, the responsibility of its failure, and of any course which the other Powers might in consequence adopt, would fall upon Holland.

SUPPLY.—£4,080,000 SUEZ CANAL SHARES.

RESOLUTION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

(In the Committee.)

Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,080,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to enable Her Majesty to pay the Purchase Money of the Shares which belonged to the Khedive of Egypt in the Suez Canal, and the Expenses attendant thereon, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876."

MR. LOWE, in resuming the adjourned debate, remarked that the first question to be settled was, oddly enough, the nature of the transaction they were about to discuss. The matter might be thought to be perfectly clear, but there was really an amount of doubt about it which it was desirable to dispel, and which he would endeavour to explain. On the first night of the Session the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury said—

"We asked the house of Rothschild to purchase those shares on our engagement to ask the House of Commons to take them off their hands. It was a great risk."

Now, if that were really the question which the House had to consider there would be a very great probability that the House, having carefully considered the matter, would think that that was a transaction which it was not called upon necessarily to ratify at all; because the house of Rothschild having made the purchase only on the faith that the Government would recommend the House of Commons to take the purchase off their hands, no money would have passed, and it would have been open to the House of Commons to consider the whole question as if no pledge had been given. But that was not the case, he was sorry to say. The right hon. Gentleman was not quite accurate in his statement, though the real facts of the case were stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Properly speaking, the question was not of our taking the shares off Messrs. Rothschild's hands, but of our having purchased the shares and borrowed money from Messrs. Rothschild to pay for them. That was a simple description of the transaction, and disposed of the statement of the first night of the Session, made no doubt from the erroneous view that no money had passed. So far from no money having passed, the fact was that £4,000,000 had been lent to the English Government on the faith that they would apply to Parliament for repayment, and that was an extremely different question from the question whether we were not bound to take upon ourselves the purchase made by other persons even under the recommendation of the Government. Nor was it therefore true that, as the right hon. Gentleman said, it was a great risk, because when money had been borrowed on behalf of the English Government—when they had had the money and actually spent it—the House of Commons would not be likely to say—"We have had the money and will not repay it." This point, as the Committee would see, was not an unimportant one. He had now, singularly enough, to charge the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with inaccuracy—a circumstance so unlikely that it would require the strongest proof. In this case, however, he did not think there was any room for doubt. The right hon. Gentleman had moved for a Vote of £4,080,000, and that Vote was made up in this way—there was £3,976,582, the purchase money of the shares, and there was £99,414 for the commission of 2½ per cent to Messrs. Rothschild. Then there was about £4,000 for small expenses; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer laid these sums before the House as being the whole cost of the shares. So far, however, from that being the whole cost, the fact was that there had to be added a sum of £37,000; and for this reason, that the Messrs. Rothschild were not only to receive a commission of 2½ per cent on the amount of the purchase, but were also to charge interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on the £4,000,000 until the date of repayment. There was the difficulty. No doubt there was some misunderstanding here, for there were two accounts of what was to be done—one contained in the Treasury Minute, and the other in a letter written by Messrs. Rothschild themselves. In the Treasury Minute it was distinctly stated that the Messrs. Rothschild were to charge a commission of 2½ per cent on the £4,000,000 which they undertook to provide, and also that they were to receive the interest of 5 per cent from the Khedive upon the amount advanced from the date of the advance until the date of repayment of such advance by Her Majesty's Government. On the other hand, the Messrs. Rothschild, having been asked by the Secretary to the Treasury to state their terms in writing, gave a very different version of the affair. They write—

"It is also understood that we are to charge Her Majesty's Government a commission of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent upon the £4,000,000, and 5 per cent interest per annum until the date of repayment."

So that it appeared from the Treasury Minute that this was to be paid by the Khedive, whereas according to Messrs. Rothschild's Minute it was to be paid by the Government. Now, if it was worth while to write to Messrs. Rothschild to ask them to put their contract in form, one would have thought that it would have been worth while to ascertain who was right and who was wrong. That, however, did not appear to have been done, and so the matter remained in its present state. There was, however, no doubt about it. Of course Messrs. Rothschild's letter was what they would be bound by and not the Treasury Minute, and it was the duty of the Government to pay them this 5 per cent, and they ought not to look for it from the Khedive. Of course, if the Khedive did pay it, it would really be we who would pay it all the same, because it would be intercepting money that was to come to us from the Khedive. He maintained that it was the duty of the Government to have made this sum for interest, whatever it happened to be, part of the Vote. They would not have the thing clearly and fairly before them until that was done; and, as to intercepting the money before it reached the Treasury, he submitted that that was a most improper proceeding. The rule of the Treasury, as he understood it, was that all monies coming to the Government should be paid into the Exchequer, and that all monies paid by the Government should come out of the Exchequer, and it was never permitted that money should be received and paid away by the Government without going through that process. It never could be allowed that money should be intercepted in its course, and a debtor of the Government allowed to pay to a creditor of the Government. The whole proceeding appeared to him as irregular, and they had a right to insist that the sum, whatever it was, that had to be paid for the forbearance of this interest should be inserted in the Vote. Not to do so was really misleading the House as to the amount that the purchase had cost. The Khedive, as far as he could see, was not a gentleman likely to let money lie idle in the bank, and it was probable that as soon as the money was in the bank it would be out of it. As far as he could estimate it, that sum would amount to £37,000, which was a considerable item in addition to the £100,000 which they were to pay already for this service; and he put it to the House whether it would not be better to reform the Vote by including that amount and making provision for its payment. As he was upon this subject, he might say—and he did so with great regret—that the sums to be thus charged were of the most exorbitant character. They really almost surpassed belief. Let them remember that the house of Rothschild had done nothing for them but to lend them the money. It was a simple question of borrowing on certain terms. But on what terms did they borrow? There was an element of uncertainty in it which he could not very well master; therefore he would not put down any estimate of his own which might be liable to cavil and objection. It was quite clear that the sum the house of Rothschild would receive was about £137,000, and what they had done for that was to forbear what would be the equivalent of £1,000,000 for nine months. There was not the least risk in the world as to the money being paid, and to charge the British Government at the rate of something approaching 20 per cent on a pure borrowing transaction was a matter most necessary the Government should justify and explain in a manner more satisfactory than he had heard yet, for it was not merely that it was a heavy loss, but it put this country on a level with all those States which experienced a difficulty in borrowing money. It was a degradation to us. If anybody told them that England in the present day would borrow money at 15 or 20 per cent, would any man have believed it? It was all the worse because it was not put forward honestly and fairly as borrowing. It was put on the ground of commission, although it had nothing to do with commission. He also thought it would be an objectionable proceeding that any Government in a matter of this kind should deal by itself face to face with any private concern whatever. The Government had an agency to which it could always have recourse in matters of this nature for advice and assistance, and that he conceived to be the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England. He thought every Minister who was wise and prudent, and wished to save his name from any slur or reproach, would adopt that course. What had happened to himself? He had to pay to the Government of America £3,200,000, and the question was how to pay it. What he did was this—he sent for the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England and asked their advice, and they hit on a plan of paying the money by which, instead of charging the Government anything for paying that amount in gold on the day fixed, they actually saved £5,000 out of that amount. The question arose, no doubt, what was the proper course to be taken—whether, as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to say on the first night of the Session, we could, if we wished, refuse to pay this money? He (Mr. Lowe) maintained that there was no such possibility. We were bound to pay the money, and, grievous as he might think it was, there was no alternative whatever. There was, therefore, no risk in making the loan, because we could not avoid paying it, and that was founded on the plainest principles of public policy; because everyone must admit that occasions would arise when it might be most desirable that the Government should borrow money, and if we so dealt with the present transaction as that the person who lent the money should have the least excuse for saying he ran a risk that the borrower would not fulfil his pledge, the result would be that in difficult and dangerous times, when party spirit ran high, the Government would not be able to borrow the money at all, and in more tranquil times they would have to borrow it at a high rate of interest. The result, therefore, would be to take from the Government the possibility of borrowing money, and to give people an excuse which they were always ready to make—that there were risk and danger in the matter—and so exorbitant terms would be given and taken. Therefore, whatever might be their opinion of this transaction, they were bound as a matter of honour to fulfil their pledge, and on that point he should give his vote for Her Majesty's Government, only hoping that they would make the thing complete by adding an estimate for the rest of the money

which we should certainly pay. He turned now from the form of the question to the substance of it. This subject might be regarded from three points of view. It might be considered as a great political demonstration, or as purely a financial affair, or merely as a question of acquiring an interest in the Canal. The first of these views, no doubt, made the Government very popular, and was caught up by the Press, especially in the metropolis, and by many newspapers throughout the country, because they believed that a spirited policy was at hand, which, however expensive it might be to the rest of the community, was sure to be profitable to the newspapers. They thought we were about to have stirring events, and a great deal of popularity was made for the Government in that way. The newspapers went upon the view that what we were doing in Egypt would ultimately lead to establishing a Protectorate, and to placing us in very stirring and exciting circumstances, which would be exceedingly agreeable to all the readers of the daily and weekly Press. That view being entertained by the writers of the daily and weekly Press, they must have undergone a great deal of disappointment when they found the idea repudiated by the Government, and of course they had all no choice but to accept that repudiation. But while they accepted it, he thought they must complain that the withdrawal of this element had left some of the conduct of the Government absolutely and entirely unintelligible. He alluded now to the mission of Mr. Cave. Could anyone tell them with what object the mission was undertaken, if it was not with a view of a political demonstration? The facts were very short. On the 4th of November Nuba Pasha wrote to General Stanton as follows:—

“I have had the honour of speaking to you respecting the two persons whom His Highness would be desirous of engaging to fill, in the Finance Department, and under the direction and orders of the Minister of Finance, the two divisions of that Department—that is to say, the direction of the receipts and the direction of the expenditure. His Highness has also spoken to you on the same subject, as well as Sir Bartle Frere. It would be desirable that the persons to be engaged, or at least one of them, should be not only familiar with the internal organization of the divisions which would be intrusted to them, such as simplifying the system of keeping the registers, the drawing up of financial statements, &c., but that they should also be familiar with the principles of political economy, which, in modern times, have been the cause of revealing the true principles which govern the development of the resources and riches of a country. I beg you, on the part of His Highness, to have the goodness to apply to the Foreign Office to recommend to us two persons having the necessary requirements to fill these posts, and at the same time to indicate the conditions which should be offered for their services."

Now, under those circumstances, could anyone reasonably doubt what the answer of the Government ought to have been? Might they not have said that they would send out two young men well versed in such matters from one of the public offices, say, from the Inland Revenue, with the expression of a hope that their services would be found of use to the Khedive? That was what a reasonable Government would have done, and he had no doubt would have been done by Her Majesty's present Advisers had they not had some particular motive for taking a different course, and, as it seemed to him, some desire to make a great fuss and delay in the matter, for Lord Derby, in his reply, said that they had

"Every desire to render to the Khedive any assistance which it may be in their power to give towards the reorganization of the Financial Department of his Administration; but the information afforded to them as to the actual condition of Egyptian finance, and as to the powers proposed to be given to the Gentlemen to be nominated by Her Majesty's Government was of so vague and general a character that it seemed to be impossible to suggest the names of gentlemen to be appointed or the conditions of their engagement."

That was to say, that the services of two Treasury clerks being required, "the information as to the powers to be given them" was regarded by the Government as "too vague," the fact being that no powers were to be given them, and that they were not to be asked to re-organize a public Department at all, but to work under a Finance Minister. Was there ever such trifling? What independent Sovereign had ever before received such an answer from a friendly State upon a matter in itself so small? But then the Government went on to say that, "after giving the matter the best consideration in their power, they had arrived at the conclusion that it was impossible to obtain by means of correspondence a satisfactory understanding on those two important points"—referring to the powers which were to be given to two young clerks—and that "they had determined that a gentleman possessing their full confidence, and of well-known financial capacity, should be sent out"—to do what?—"to confer with the Khedive and his Government as to the financial position of Egypt and its administration." The Khedive never asked them to do this; but it appeared that there was to be a report made on him by this person—he was, as it were, to be put in the dock—for the letter went on to say that "then Her Majesty's Government would be in a better position to give the assistance that was required of them," and they selected Mr. Cave to be their special envoy. It was like the old joke of making flint soup, which had never been better illustrated. But that was not all. The letter went on to say that four gentlemen were to be sent out to assist Mr. Cave in his diplomatic correspondence and in his financial inquiries, so that the result was that for these two men in buckram they had now Mr. Cave and his four assistants, with Colonel Stokes added. He (Mr. Lowe) ventured to say a more extraordinary thing had never taken place. The House was told that the purchase of the Suez Canal shares had nothing to do with politics—nothing to do with the Protectorate of Egypt, and under all those circumstances no man in his senses could, he thought, believe that the real grounds had been stated in that Paper for sending out Mr. Cave to ransack the whole finances of Egypt and to make a report on it to the Government. The whole thing was an enigma of which no solution had yet been furnished, and he hoped, therefore, some solution of it would be given before the end of the debate. He would give an illustration of the way in which the matter presented itself to his mind. Let him suppose that he had asked a friend if he knew a butler who would suit him, that the reply was—"I will think about it," and that the next morning, hearing a disturbance downstairs, he went to his kitchen, and found five gentlemen seated there, who described themselves as being the men to suit him, and that one sent by his friend asked him—"How many silver spoons have you got?" another—"How many table-cloths?" another—"Who is your butcher?" "Give us the key of your cellar," and so on—would such conduct be more preposterous than that which was done by the Government when they sent out an envoy and four able assistants, over several thousand miles of land and sea, to ransack the finances of Egypt and to turn them upside down, with no other excuse than that they were asked to recommend two clerks? If it had not been repudiated by Her Majesty's Government he should have said the solution of that enigma was that it was a part of the spirited policy which had been attributed to them. That not being so, however, the enigma remained so entirely an enigma that he hoped some hon. Gentleman on the other side would clear it up that evening. He would further observe that Mr. Cave had made a report, and that he should very much like to see that right hon. Gentleman before the money was voted which the House was asked to supply. Mr. Cave was to have been at home a month ago; but, unfortunately, his arrival here had been delayed by one cause or another, although his company would have been most agreeable that evening. The next circumstance in this transaction was even more strange. His excellent Friend Mr. Wilson, who held a very important office, which he administered to the satisfaction of Her Majesty's Government, was, at a very busy period of the year, to go out to Egypt to see if he could agree with the Khedive, and if not he was to come back again. Considering that all the Khedive asked for was two clerks, considering that Mr. Wilson had a most desirable and valuable office, the duties of which he was thoroughly competent to discharge, was it likely that he was going to Egypt to be placed under the Finance Minister, and unless he did that was not sending him out the merest trifling? Did any one believe that the Khedive would take an Englishman and put him over all his officials, and give him such a salary as would induce such a man to leave his valuable appointment in England, unless it were for an object more important than that professed by the Government? It looked to him like a lingering desire to prolong the glory acquired in that field already for the longest time possible. These remarks, however, he had merely made with the view to elicit some explanation from the Government, and he would now pass on to another part of the subject. Before doing so, he would read a few words from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the previous Monday, and he was very glad he was able to read that speech edited by himself, because a good deal depended on the wording. The right hon. Gentleman said—and he would call the attention of the Committee to it—

"But we thought we should be cowards if we were to shrink from the responsibility of fulfilling the trust which had been committed to our keeping. We did not come to a sudden decision—that is to say, we did not come to a decision the first moment this proposal was made to us—without a due knowledge of the circumstances of the case. We did not come to a resolution in the course of an hour or two. We had had this question of the Suez Canal for months and years under our notice, and we had had this special crisis under our notice for a period of more than 10 days. We had at our command information enabling us fully to understand what we were about, and we arrived at our decision deliberately."

Now, from the latter part of that statement he most emphatically dissented. So far from their having information to enable them to understand what they were about, and arrive at a decision deliberately, he maintained that nothing of the kind occurred. What occurred was this—The Government, with almost incredible negligence and carelessness, omitted to inform themselves of the circumstances which were most material to be known with regard to the purchase of these shares. Having so made the purchase, they were now—he hardly knew how to phrase it—putting the matter before them as if that which was the result of a great oversight and an almost incredible piece of negligence and carelessness was really their deliberate view and opinion. ["Oh, oh!"] That was what he asserted. Of course, his assertion was nothing; but he would prove it. Let it be clearly understood, again, what it was he asserted. He maintained that the Government committed a most enormous oversight in failing to ascertain what it was their duty to ascertain—that was, whether the shares carried votes with them; and that having done so, instead of confessing it at once, they were now putting before the country and before the House that which they had done under a sort of involuntary compulsion produced by ignorance as if it were their own free and deliberate act. What the Government meant to have done was, no doubt, to purchase a considerable amount of power in the Suez Canal, and when they purchased these shares they certainly thought they bought votes with them. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Oh, no; they did not.] He still maintained that that was the case, and would give this proof of it. He would show from the Correspondence that at, before, and after the time of the purchase the leading Members of the Government were of opinion that these shares did confer votes, and that their purchase did give us great and important influence. If he could show that by documentary evidence he should make out his case. In order to do so, he would have to call the attention of the House to certain details connected with the transaction. The purchase of the Suez Canal shares was made on the 25th of November; on the 26th the news was published; and on the 3rd of December there came from Egypt a despatch stating that the English Government could only obtain 10 votes. It appeared from the printed Papers that Lord Derby, writing to Lord Lyons on the 20th of November, said—

“The Khedive, in parting with the shares which he now possessed in the Suez Canal Company, would, in my opinion, surrender an important means of influencing the measures taken by the Company and its staff, and as such we could not look upon such a transaction with indifference.”

How could the Khedive, who had so much power over the Company in other ways, “surrender an important means of influencing the measures taken by the Company” unless his shares carried votes? This was only a surmise, but still it was forcible as far as it went, for the words had no meaning if the writer supposed the shares would carry no votes, or only 10 votes. Again, the Earl of Derby, writing to Lord Lyons on the 27th, two days afterwards, said, with reference to a conversation he had had with the Marquess d’Harcourt, the French Ambassador—

“I added that we had even now a minority of the Canal shares; but that the question for Her Majesty’s Government was not one of establishing an exclusive interest, but of preventing an exclusive interest from being established as against this country.”

What did that mean? What was the sense of alluding to a minority of votes if the shares carried no votes, or only 10 votes? It was clear that the expression pointed to a belief in the mind of the writer that there was a power of voting connected with the shares, and that we should be better off with a large than with a small power of voting. These passages, he admitted, were by no means conclusive; but at a trial it was not the practice to prove everything at once. He next came to another point. The day after the shares were purchased the Government thought it necessary to apprise the public of what they had done, and leading articles appeared in the various newspapers. He did not mean to say, however, that the Government were answerable for everything that was written by the glowing pens of the journalists. This was what appeared in The Times, and what appeared in The Times was frequently of very great importance—

“When the assent of Parliament shall have been given the British State will succeed to all Ismail Pasha’s immense interest in the enterprise and become the chief proprietor, with an influence predominating over every other.”

The meaning was as clear as words could make it. It was possible the Government might have never intended to give The Times this view of the case, and, if so, what so natural as to say to the editor—“You are going rather too fast; we did not mean that we had got the votes—only that we had got the shares.” So far from that, see how The Times came out next day. On the 27th it said—

“We have purchased nearly half the shares in the Suez Canal. We are the largest proprietors, and it need not be said that the others will look to us for the management of the property, the protection of the common interest, and the maintenance of satisfactory relations with her local government and the other powers of the world.”

[“Hear, hear!” from the Treasury Benches.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite thought this did not mean that we had got a large power of voting, but that the other proprietors would look to us merely for the management of the property. Well, how could we manage the property if we had no votes? And now there came what he really thought was conclusive on the subject—he meant the letter of the Marquess d’Harcourt describing an interview between himself and the Earl of Derby, who at this time was minimizing and making as little of the matter as he could. On that occasion the Earl of Derby said—

"I deny on behalf of my Colleagues and myself any intention of predominating in the deliberations of the Company or of abusing our recent acquisition to force its decisions."

["Hear, hear!" from the Treasury Benches.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite did not seem to see the force of it. If Lord Derby had known how matters really stood he might have said—"Predominating influence! Why, we can do nothing whatever, because the legal opinion is that we have no votes; therefore, what nonsense it is for you to talk to me about predominating influence!" How could the Government possibly abuse their recent acquisition to force the decisions of the Company, unless they had some power in the deliberations of the Company, and could exercise a paramount voting power to force on the Company that which might be distasteful to them? He was not the least desirous to put any strained construction on these passages, and if they could be interpreted in any other sense no one would be more pleased than himself to accept such interpretation. Then there was another matter which was not conclusive, but which was important in itself. He had already alluded to Mr. Cave's Mission. Well, Colonel Stokes was appointed on the staff, and on the 6th December these remarkable words were written to him by the Earl of Derby—

This was written three days after the announcement in The Times that the shares only gave 10 votes. This accounts for the remarkable change of tone between the 27th of November and the 6th of December. If Government knew the position which they would occupy, what was the use of sending Colonel Stokes to inquire into it? He had given his reasons for believing that probably no votes at all were attached to the shares, and certainly no more than 10. These were his charges against the Government, and if they could be answered nobody would be better pleased than he would be. They would get their Vote to-night, the thing was done, and he would be very glad if the exceptions which he had taken could be removed. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that nothing would give him greater pleasure than to find that he had been mistaken. Still he said that unless they could explain these passages the Government must be considered to have aided in the purchase, under the delusion that, in purchasing these shares they were purchasing votes, and that they ought to have come candidly forward and admitted the oversight which they had made. The Government had a great many motives, they had been told, for buying these shares. One was, that they might keep the canal open and prevent a monopoly—a most excellent reason. But how would the buying of shares without votes assist them in preventing the canal from becoming a monopoly? They could not, by buying these shares, do anything towards the management of the canal. These shares for 19 years were a mere deadweight. They might pay the £4,000,000, but during that period it was as if these shares did not exist. Even supposing that they gave 10 votes, what advantage would they give? They would confer no influence on the Company, which seldom met, and whose main business consisted in the appointment of the directors. Lord Derby said the other day that, if anybody doubted that the possession of two-fifths of the shares in this canal gave no influence to the holders, it was as difficult to argue with such a man as it would be to argue with a man who said that two and two did not make four. Now the ordinary meaning of shares was that they carried with them the right to dividends and votes. Lord Derby's illustration assumed that the possessor of the shares here had exactly what he had not. It should read—"If anybody doubts that the possessor of two-fifths of these shares, minus dividends and votes, obtains no influence from those shares, it is as difficult to argue with him," and so on. But then, it was said, the power of making faggot votes was a formidable weapon in our hands. Now, in the first place, he was not at all sure that we should be able to make faggot votes, because he rather believed that these shares gave no votes, faggot or otherwise. But suppose such votes could be made, what would be the result? What we should do would be to array the majority against us and prevent them from giving us three directors at the Board, as they were now disposed to do. M. de Lesseps was now well disposed towards us. It was his wish to give us three directors, if he were not irritated; but it must be remembered that these questions would be tried before a French Court, and an attempt to swamp French shareholders by English faggot votes would not meet with a very favourable reception. But the Papers would show how little these votes were worth to secure us the benefits of a representation in the directorate. At page 142 there was a letter from Sir Daniel Lange to Lord Granville, dated April 19, 1871, in which he said he had mentioned to M. de Lesseps the alternative of no dividend for the shareholders or British assistance and entire management, M. de Lesseps retaining his position as President, but without the periodical anxiety he was now under as to finance. But, said Sir Daniel Lange, M. de Lesseps "recoiled with aversion" from this proposal, and declared that he would never be a party to the transfer of the management from French to English hands, trusting rather to the introduction of a few English directors upon the French Board, so as to share the responsibility. Thus M. de Lesseps had long been anxious to give seats to English directors upon the Board, not, however, with a view to give power to England, but to keep the power. Yet what he had been willing to do for five years was put forward as one of the principal triumphs of the Government in the purchase of these shares. Thanking the House for the attention with which it had listened to him, he hoped that somebody would be able to explain away what appeared to be the fact—that the absence of votes was unknown to the Government when the shares were bought. If such an explanation were given he should be glad to withdraw the charges he had made.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the case of the right hon. Gentleman was so weak, that no one on the Ministerial side of the House would anticipate much danger from his attack, or regret that it was made. He accused the First Lord of inaccuracy in saying that the advance made by Messrs. Rothschild was not a loan, but merely an advance. The Treasury Minute, however, showed that the money had been advanced on the pledge of Her Majesty's Government that they would submit the engagement to the sanction of Parliament and endeavour to obtain the necessary powers to repay the advance and the commission as soon as might be practicable after the meeting of Parliament. This was in no sense a loan; it was merely a purchase by Messrs. Rothschild of the Khedive's shares, which they undertook to sell again to the Government when they obtained powers from Parliament for that purpose. The right hon. Gentleman also said that there was a sum of £37,000 not accounted for in the Estimate. But it was accounted for in the Treasury Minute, which showed that Messrs. Rothschild were to receive 2½ per cent upon the £4,000,000, and not 5 per cent interest, but the 5 per cent interest which the Khedive undertook to pay upon the amount advanced until the date of repayment. Then the right hon. Gentleman claimed credit for having saved £5,000 out of the sum so humiliatingly expended in satisfying the Alabama Claims. But the right hon. Gentleman did not answer the complaint that the interval which elapsed between the time of the Alabama Award and the calling together of Parliament and submitting the necessary Vote was far greater than the interval which had elapsed here. Government had been asked why Parliament was not summoned at the time when the purchase was first contemplated, but in answer to that he would ask what position the noble Marquess opposite would have been in at that time, in view of the fact that he was not ready to discuss the question when it was brought forward on Monday last? The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken asked why the house of Rothschild was to receive a commission of 2½ per cent upon the transaction—a question which he should not attempt to answer, as he did not profess to understand that branch of the subject. He could, however, answer another remark of the right hon. Gentleman, who said that Messrs. Rothschild incurred no risk in the matter. Many things might have happened which would have created a great amount of risk. He remembered that a Government equally powerful with the present had dissolved Parliament in a less time than had elapsed, and that if that contingency had arisen on the present occasion a Government might—he did not say that it would—have acceded to power which would have repudiated the provisional arrangement come to with Messrs. Rothschild. He therefore thought it clear that the banking firm incurred a risk for which, as commercial men, they were fully entitled to be compensated. The right hon. Gentleman had thrown some sort of doubt upon the veracity of the Government with reference to their knowledge, when the purchase was first contemplated, of the fact that the possession of the shares would or would not carry voting power. In support of his view on this point the right hon. Gentleman relied upon the despatch of Lord Derby to Lord Lyons—a despatch in which the Marquess d'Harcourt reported to his Government the conversation he had, on the same day, had with Lord Derby as to the purchase, and certain articles published in The Times. He admitted that in his despatch to Lord Lyons, Lord Derby did not allude to the voting power, but the Marquess d'Harcourt put it in his despatch that Lord Derby had denied any intention on the part of the Government to dominate over the deliberations of the Company. With reference to the articles in The Times, the right hon. Gentleman spoke as if he believed them to be verbally inspired, but he must surely know that newspaper articles were only partially inspired. He supposed that the Editor of The Times received information to the effect that the purchase was in contemplation, and that when completed the Government would obtain certain powers; but it did not therefore follow that the whole of the details contained in The Times' leaders were furnished by Her Majesty's Government. As a matter of fact, the Government would obtain certain influence by the purchase of the shares, an influence not solely depending upon the actual shares, but also upon the fact that the Khedive, from whom they were purchased, was represented in the Company by a controller, and would back up, where necessary, the Power which had purchased his property at a time when the amount of the purchase-money was essential to him. The appointment of Mr. Cave had nothing to do with the purchase of the shares, and therefore it was not necessary to follow the right hon. Gentleman in what he had said upon that point. He might say, however, that such an appointment was not without precedent. Some years ago the Government of Lord Palmerston sent out two "young men"—to quote the phrase of the right hon. Gentleman—in the person of the then Assistant Paymaster General and Lord Hobart, one of the principal clerks in the Board of Trade, to investigate and report upon the finances of Turkey. These Gentlemen reported in a sort of perfunctory way, and their Report was laid on the Table of the House; and, in his belief, the decadence of Turkish finance dated from that time. He did not think it necessary to say anything in reference to any desire that might exist to establish a Protectorate or to obtain any exclusive influence in Egypt. The views of England in reference to Egypt were well-expressed in 1853 by Sir Hamilton Seymour when Egypt was offered to him, as representing Her Majesty, by the Emperor Nicholas of Russia. He said—

"As I did not wish that the Emperor should imagine that an English public servant was caught by this sort of overture, I simply answered that I had always understood that the English views upon Egypt did not go beyond the point of securing a safe and steady communication between British India and the mother country."

He declined to consider the question as one of investment, and would only remark that while it was perfectly equitable for a State to sink money in large sums with no immediate return and for indirect political objects, it was clear to his mind that, whereas the £4,000,000 invested in these shares would obtain something for the country, the other £3,000,000 to which reference had been made were gone to that bourn whence no traveller returned. Neither this country nor her Allies had looked on this transaction from a money point of view, but had simply regarded it as a renewal of the energy, vigour, and "go" which had so long been dormant in our foreign policy, but which he could not doubt was essential to their prosperity. It was proper for England to take the lead in a movement which was to throw open the trade in this canal. She had taken the initiative in Free Trade and in free navigation, and it was right that she should take the initiative in making this canal more serviceable for the world. In 1858 the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), speaking with political foresight, said that the interest of England in the Canal scheme was identical with the interest of mankind, and the right hon. Gentleman the present Member for Greenwich supported this view. The policy of England in reference to the matter was clear from the first. In 1871 it was recommended by a high official in the Board of Trade that the Canal should be placed in the care of some sort of International Commission, instancing the Danubian Commission for the purpose, and in 1874 Lord Derby made it clear that his views were in consonance with the principle involved in the purchase, which Parliament was now asked to approve. Having this object in view the Government availed themselves of an opportunity which would give them a commanding position in carrying out any policy of the kind. It was certainly best for the interest of everybody concerned that the shares should neither be concentrated in the hands of a French Company, nor distributed among a vast number of small proprietors, who, if redemption were sought, would raise their price in an exorbitant manner. He believed the House, in acting in this manner, would have to refer to redemptions in other periods of history, because there had been many cases of redemption from which they might take a good lesson. The whole history of the Post Office was a history of redemption, because the Government bought up the coaches and recently bought up the telegraphs; and something might be found in the history of the transfer of the East India Company; while with regard to foreign questions there were the Scheldt and the Sound dues. He therefore looked upon our position as shareholders as merely transitory and temporary, and one which was intended to pave the way to a larger and more extended policy. This necessity for redemption might arise out of the fact of the municipal and international rights appertaining to the Company being found to conflict. Now, on the subject of the traffic, if they looked at that of last year they would find that every ship that passed through the Canal cost £800 in toll—a very large sum, which in time commerce would no doubt resist. He did not wish to enter into any question of International Law, but he would ask attention to a statement made by M. de Lesseps in 1856, in a book he wrote on the subject of the Canal, and in which he said—

“In the Memorial which I presented to His Highness the Viceroy on the 15th of November, 1854, and which was the starting-point of the enterprise, the following passage is found:—‘Why have the Governments and the nations of the West united to maintain the Grand Signor in possession of Constantinople, and why has the man who wished to threaten that position met the armed opposition of Europe? Because the passage of the Mediterranean to the Black Sea is of such importance that a great European Power who became mistress of it would dominate over all the others, and would upset an equilibrium which all the world is interested in preserving. Let there be established on another point of the Ottoman Empire a similar and still more important position. Let Egypt be made the passage for the commerce of the world by the cutting of the Isthmus of Suez, and there will be created in the East a double position beyond attack.’”

In a Report attached to the same, the question was put—

“Was it possible to make an artificial Bosphorus between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, and to re-establish by the hand of man the communication which Nature had formerly made between the two seas now separated?”

Now, if the Khedive of Egypt and M. de Lesseps wanted to establish another Bosphorus with a view to obtain similar political advantages to those enjoyed by the possessors of the Bosphorus, they would surely put themselves under the same political obligations, and those obligations were set forth in the Treaty of Adrianople of 1829, by which the Bosphorus was to be opened to the ships of all nations. If that were so, the reasoning had still greater force when applied to the Suez Canal, because the Bosphorus only led to the possessions of two countries and the Black Sea, whereas the Suez Canal united two seas and was available for the navigation of the world. He could only regret that the opposition which was encountered by the promoters of the Canal in this country at the outset prevented any common understanding being arrived at similar to that which was contained in the celebrated Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. That Treaty laid down that the Canal which was to be established between the Atlantic and the Pacific should be guaranteed as to its integrity by Great Britain and the United States—that, if war occurred between those Powers, the ships of each should be exempt from blockade or capture; and the contracting parties engaged to invite the States with which they were on terms of friendly intercourse to enter into like stipulations. He hoped and believed that the act of the Government in purchasing those shares was merely the first step towards the carrying out of some general understanding between the nations of the world. In conclusion, he would ask leave to read a few apposite words pronounced in an eloquent speech by the late Prime Minister, when he advocated the annexation of the Ionian Islands to Greece, and those words might be pleaded by right hon. Gentlemen below him to right hon. Gentlemen opposite.

"I think," he said, "I may fairly appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether, with the complexity of affairs and the diversity of personal interests we had to deal with, he could have pointed out any order of proceedings more reasonable in itself, more conformable to public law, or more likely to attain the object in view than that actually which we followed."—[3 Hansard, clixiv. 382.]

He asked the right hon. Gentleman, with all the deference that was due to him, whether the act of Her Majesty's Government was not the continuance and the completion of the policy in the inauguration of which he himself took so prominent and so generous a part. He had the honour of being employed with the right hon. Gentleman in a humble capacity in his mission to the Ionian Islands, and he regarded the spirit which governed the proposals he then made to Lord Derby as the spirit of justice and benevolence. The right hon. Gentleman held then that we had no interest in the Mediterranean except interests, so to say, outside the Mediterranean, and that we merely wished to establish among the nations of that sea a character for justice and upright dealing. Later on, when the right hon. Gentleman joined Lord Palmerston's Government, he still upheld the same policy. That policy Her Majesty's Government had completed by an act, legal in itself, which showed that we had no design of aggrandizement, aggression, or dominion in the Mediterranean, but rather that the country which had first thrown open its trade to the world desired to secure for the commerce and navigation of the world the freedom of a great international thoroughfare; that we had no selfish motive, no motive other than that with which our Allies could sympathize—namely, the gathering together and concentration of the interests of this stately Empire. He therefore asked the right hon. Gentleman to support Her Majesty's Government in upholding that act.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, in answer to the appeal of the hon. Member, although I am afraid I cannot do it by uttering sentiments altogether such as he would wish, or in any degree concur in his views. I agree, as the House must, I think, generally agree with my right hon. Friend, at least, in that portion of his speech in which he pointed out the disadvantages in which we stand as a deliberative Assembly. My right hon. Friend contended that this was virtually a completed transaction—that we had made a contract with the Khedive, and that the question remaining was, whether we should authorize Her Majesty's Government to re-imburse a private firm which had for the time found the money. I believe the statement of my right hon. Friend to be a correct statement. If it can be shown that we have a larger liberty accorded to us than the very stinted opportunity of which he spoke, I shall be glad to hear proof of such a proposition; but for the present I believe that the feeling of the House is one of doubt whether it is worth while to enter into the elaborate and complicated details of a question with regard to which there virtually remains to us no choice. We are, I believe, with regard to our general credit, committed as a body in the face of Europe to this transaction, in which Europe takes a deep interest; and even on other grounds it would be difficult to retract. I believe we are further and more definitely committed by the fact, assumed and asserted by my right hon. Friend, that it is we, and not the firm of Rothschilds, that have made the purchase; that it is with us, and not with the Rothschilds, the Khedive has contracted; and the seven zinc boxes which contain those valuable shares have, I believe, been handed over to our custody, or to the custody of the Queen's officers, and not to Messrs. Rothschild. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] Well, that is the impression under which I speak. If it can be shown that Her Majesty's Government have entered into no contract, then they will have to produce Papers which shall substantially contradict the whole of the Papers that have been laid upon the Table. But, Sir, however that may be, I hope the House and the Government will not grudge the time which is necessary for the investigation of this subject. The proposition of Her Majesty's Government, upon the ground I have stated, I believe to be safe from anything like party, political, or Parliamentary opposition; and if the Government desire to stand well with the country with respect to this great and important proposal, they will act wisely, I think, in abstaining from all appearance of a desire to hurry this question through the House. It is not a question that can possibly lead to very intricate proceedings upon its details. The proposals are simple enough, although the grounds and reasons are complicated; and it is desirable that a much more full investigation should be made in the matter—at least, that it should be brought more fully home to the minds of the people of this country than it has been or could be until the question came under discussion in this House. Now, Sir, I should like to begin by doing an act of justice to two persons. It is not a pleasant duty to detain the House with a statement of misgivings, difficulties, and objections, and I will gladly begin by discharging a pleasanter part of my duty. The name of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has recurred, and must often recur, in the course of this discussion. I wish frankly to state that I do not regard the Chancellor of the Exchequer as loaded with any special responsibility in the matter. He is responsible as a Cabinet Minister, and very great is the responsibility which Her Majesty's Government have taken upon themselves. They have deviated widely from the usual paths of the Constitution, and nothing but the strongest and most evident public interest can justify them in the step which they have taken. But I well know what is the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when a measure is brought forward by the Government with respect to which he and the whole world must feel that, although its finance is important, yet the financial aspect is secondary in comparison with other interests involved. He cannot possibly claim that financial considerations shall rule, yet, when the measure is adopted, and when the matter is managed in the face of the House of Commons, it is upon him that the principal responsibility devolves; and for these reasons I wish it to be clearly understood, though I must refer to him repeatedly as the organ and spokesman of the Government, yet I do not forget that he did not get any special credit for the sagacity, promptitude, courage, and I know not what, which descended in showers of gold upon the Government for some days after the announcement of what had been done. He is to be regarded as merely performing an official duty in the share he has taken in introducing the subject to the House. I wish also to do justice to some other gentlemen whose names may be mentioned frequently in the course of this debate—I mean the Messrs. Rothschild. It appears to me that, whatever may have been the course of proceeding adopted by Her Majesty's Government—however provident or improvident their arrangements may have been—no blame whatever, great or small, direct or indirect, can attach to those gentlemen. They are a private firm, engaged in business on a gigantic scale, it is true, but guided by the same methods which must govern the pursuits of commerce in general. The Messrs. Rothschild were not the guardians of the Constitution. It was not their business to stand sentry upon the principles and rules necessary for the conduct of finance, and, whatever questions I may raise as to that portion of the proceedings of the Government which affected them, it was not the intention of my right hon. Friend near me, nor is it my desire, to reflect in any particular, or in the slightest degree, upon the conduct of the Messrs. Rothschild. I must own that a considerable change has taken place in the public view on this question since the intentions and plans of the Government were first announced. The general belief at that time, promoted by nearly the whole of the metropolitan Press—I think by the whole of the metropolitan daily Press—was that a great blow had been struck for the assertion of British power; that, in the critical circumstances of the Turkish Empire, notice had been given to the world that, so far as Egypt was concerned, we intended to have the first and largest share in determining what should be its destiny. With respect to the sufficiency of the measure, when the public were informed that out of 400,000 shares we had acquired 176,000, I do not doubt—and I believe no man doubts—that the universal assumption of the world, and of the London newspapers, who at that moment led the world, was that those 176,000 shares carried with them a proportionate share of voting power in the Company. And then they very naturally argued that, as in the case of the London and North-Western Company, or any other joint-stock establishment, the directors who had secured themselves by that proportion of the votes were safe against the world, although they might not have an absolute majority, and that, having obtained seven-sixteenths of the whole property of the Company, we were in a position to exercise a corresponding influence. and consequently might bid defiance to all comers. We are, however, still in the dark as to what was the degree of information on which the Government acted in this matter. My right hon. Friend has, I think, shown provisionally—and very strong evidence must be given to show the contrary—that the Government were not aware of the limited extent of voting power attached to those shares, and it will be for the Government to explain whether that is so or not. If they were not aware of it, I must own I think they have added greatly to their responsibility in having taken a step so important, and so little within the lines of the Constitution, without being in possession of the most elementary information on the subject. These were the grounds on which the public and the Press approved the purchase, and the whole of Lord Derby's reasoning in his despatches, and his attempts to allay fear and apprehension abroad by the assurance that we had no thought of exercising a paramount influence—an exclusive influence—over the affairs of the Company would have been the merest nonsense if he had not been cognizant of the fact that there was no option given us to exercise either a paramount or a sensible influence, inasmuch as the 10 votes were votes which, if we exercised them at all, we should have to exercise in the face of votes amounting to many thousands. We are indebted, I believe, in the first instance, to the French Government for having dispelled some of the illusions by which this question was surrounded. A very fair issue was raised—the issue, indeed, I think we ought to try—when Lord Derby acquainted the world that the object of Her Majesty's Government in these proceedings was to acquire an increased security for our communications with India, because he knew very well, and we all knew, that that was an object to which we attach capital and Imperial importance. I now come to what I may term the unpleasant part of this question—namely, the mode of operation which has been adopted by the Government. So far as I know, it was not only without precedent, but it was contrary to our financial principles. There is not in the country a man of purer hands and purer honour than my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If, however, he set the very worst precedent that could be imagined, under which men very different from himself might hereafter injure the country and their characters, it would not raise the slightest presumption against himself. The First Lord of the Treasury must be regarded as equally responsible with the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the financial part of the matter, and I wish to know whether there is any precedent during the 60 years which have elapsed since the Peace of 1815, or any instance in which the Government have made a financial arrangement of a character corresponding to this, or for an amount either equal to this, or for any considerable magnitude at all, privately and with a private firm? That is a matter of the greatest consequence. The rule of our finance is that the greatest and most jealous provision is taken against malversation of every kind. If my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London, instead of being pure and upright—if I myself had been disposed to lay hands upon any of that public money of which so much passed through our hands, it would have been—I believe with the single exception of that very limited branch of the public expenditure known as "Conscience Money"—entirely beyond our power to do so. It is the wisdom of this country to surround the Finance Minister with rules that make his position perfectly safe in dealing with sums so immense, and some of the rules have reference to the mode in which he conducts those great financial operations with persons in the City. I may be wrong, but if there are any precedents I should be glad if they can be produced, because it is not to the credit of the Government of this country to deviate from established rules by a transaction of this kind. I know of no such precedents. The case which in magnitude most resembles the present one—the Arbitration Award—has no relation whatever to the matter we are now dealing with. So far as I am acquainted with the rules applicable to this subject, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he is in want of money, has this option before him—he may go to the Bank of England or to the public; but I have never heard that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was at liberty to send for any private firm, however eminent and responsible, and to contract with them for a great financial operation, involving the Treasury of this country to the extent of several millions. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer deals with the Bank of England, that is not the usual mode of conducting such operations; but I can conceive that when Parliament may not be sitting, he might be under the necessity of doing what he would not otherwise do. When he deals with the Bank of England he deals with a body which, although independent, is under the most solemn official obligations. In old times the Bank of England was not only the servant, but the trustee of the Government. It is still its trusted agent. It has enormous transactions and most lucrative engagements with the Government. It manages our issues and receives our deposits, and conducts all the transactions connected with the National Debt. It is under the deepest responsibility to Parliament and the country; and not only the heads of the Bank, but every officer of the Bank who would be taken into their confidence has the same feelings as a public servant would have in regard to transactions of this kind, and would feel the same sacred obligations of secrecy with respect to whatever might be communicated or come within his knowledge in such a matter. There are many reasons, upon which I need not dwell, which distinguish between the Bank of England and a private establishment in this matter, and I wait to be contradicted before receding from my proposition that, according to all I know, all I believe, and all I have heard, it was either the business of the Government to appeal to the public and to transact the business of the State under the most favourable terms with the public, or else to go to the confidential agents of the State—namely, the Bank of England—and ascertain, before going elsewhere, whether through them the business could be satisfactorily managed. I think it was part of the absolute duty of the Government to explain to the House why this course was not pursued. I blamed the right hon. Gentleman the other night for his conciseness. I noticed several omissions in his speech, and the number on reflection has greatly multiplied. One was, the omission to explain the very peculiar method which the Government thought proper to adopt. Now, Sir, this matter is rather a serious one. When the Government deal with the Bank of England in a question of this kind, they are perfectly certain that their confidence will be kept as much as if they were within the limits of their own office. I have not a doubt that when they dealt with Messrs. Rothschild the Government dealt with those who were personally as certain to keep their confidence as even the Governor and deputy Governor of the Bank of England, but I cannot have the same assurance with regard to the members of Messrs. Rothschild's establishment. I cannot have any assurance that there was not given an opportunity in the days between the completion of the transaction and the communication of the intelligence which enabled multitudes of persons to go into the market and there operate to the extent of many millions upon the strength of that which they knew the Government to intend and which the world did not yet know. I have already put a question as to a precedent for the manner of the proceeding with a private firm, and I will ask the Government to tell us whether they are in a condition to say, that there did not take place very large speculations in Egyptian Stocks before their plan was made public, and founded upon the knowledge that the plan had been adopted and was about to be announced. As to the amount of this commission, it may appear to be very shabby to complain of the payment of £100,000—or £130,000, as it would be more truly described—to Messrs. Rothschild on account of this transaction; still, with my right hon. Friend, I am of opinion, not only have we a right, but we are under an absolute obligation, to do the business of the public upon the most reasonable terms; but I cannot help thinking that the credit of this country is placed in a most unenviable position before the world in relation to this transaction. We are told that Messrs. Rothschild were compensated for their trouble and their risk. I want to know what was their risk. I want to know whether their risk was not a risk any rational man would have taken at the cost of one brass farthing. If ever we happened to be in a condition—which we are not—to arrest the measure of the Government, and to say it shall not go forward and we will not become proprietors in the Suez Canal—even if we were in that condition, is there a man in this House who does not know it is our absolute duty in honour and honesty to take care that Messrs. Rothschild, who are liable to no blame, either of rashness or otherwise, should not lose one iota by the transaction they carried on? Therefore, the risk is none; the payment is a payment for the use of money; and the money was £4,000,000. I cannot give, nor could my right hon. Friend give, dates minutely, because we do not know the precise dates when the sums were paid and repaid; but if I say that three months was the time during which Messrs. Rothschild were out of £4,000,000, I believe this is a liberal statement as to time. What they receive is first of all 5 per cent, which the Khedive stipulates to pay us; and, secondly  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on the capital, which for three months is 10 per cent per annum for the use of it; and that added to the 5 per cent makes 15 per cent per annum as the price at which, in the year 1875, British credit is to be appreciated in the British market. I will not stop to inquire into that now; but undoubtedly it has been said of late in several senses, including that of self-glorification, that the British Sovereign is a great Oriental Potentate. I must say if we pay 15 per cent for our money in the British market for the purpose of accommodation, it seems to prove that we are an Oriental Potentate indeed. Let me pass from the form to look at the substance of this question.

Mr. Gladstone

I make several admissions freely to my right hon. Friend. He says, as I think truly, that the public were carried away with an absolute show of approval; it amounted almost to unanimity; there never was a more complete conquest made by any Government. The individual with whom we are all acquainted, and who is well known as “the man in the street”—and almost all persons of all characters and descriptions gave their approval at the moment to the measure. The Papers produced by the Government show a considerable amount of foreign approval, and I think what we read upon the whole shows a small amount of foreign jealousy. There cannot be a doubt, as my right hon. Friend says—he seemed to contest his point, but I would re-assure him as far as I know—that we have conferred a benefit upon the Khedive; certainly we have conferred a benefit upon the Khedive, and such a benefit, I should think, never was conferred upon an Egyptian Ruler since the days when Egypt was the greatest Empire in the world, 3,000 or 4,000 years ago. You have also conferred an enormous benefit on the Suez Canal Company, and that is not the worst part of the transaction, because the Company has deserved well of the world, and I must say has received ill of us. If the cost of the Canal has been enormous, so as to be to the Company a misfortune, it was seriously aggravated by our opposition; and I am so far glad of that portion of the proceedings of Her Majesty’s Government, that as I feel, in some sense, we owe the Company a debt, if the result of the proceedings of Her Majesty’s Government is to satisfy that claim, I shall be the last man to grudge the benefit to the Company. But there was more than this. I think, upon a careful perusal of the Papers, I must admit that evidently the conduct of transactions with the Canal Company, the little tracasseries of complaint that arose upon the detention of ships, the demands for the repayment of money, the complications that arose from the ill-defined relations between the Company and the Government, the Egyptian Courts and the French, the Khedive and the Porte, did impose upon the Foreign Office very irksome and disagreeable duties, which the Government thought would justify resort to a measure of this kind. I frankly own they had much annoyance to encounter; but I do not think that any such justification can be pleaded for the present measure. But let us look at the proposal itself with regard to those justifications which have been pleaded. The former state of things may have been alarming to anyone at the Foreign Office engaged in the management of these private and personal complaints, and I daresay an Under Secretary, feeling much upon the subject, would say it was a bad state of things. It was a very complicated position of affairs; probably no joint-stock enterprise ever stood in relations so complex as the Suez Canal Company. It had its hold upon France; it had its legal domicile in France; a quasi French character attached to it; a very large preponderance of French shareholders; it was absolutely subject to both Egyptian and Turkish law; and I need not say that the lines of division between Egyptian and Turkish authority are ill-defined. It was therefore a most complicated position in which this Company stood; it was not very agreeable or satisfactory to them; but I do not see that it was a matter of capital concern to the world. It was for us a perfectly practicable and workable position—the Company was a great power, and the resisting power lay in all the Maritime Powers of Europe having one thought, one purpose, one interest in reference to the Canal, and all of them working together. The matter had come to issue. The Company had attempted to exercise its powers and impose charges which the Maritime States thought unreasonable. As the right hon. Gentleman said, M. de Lesseps, who has shown great gallantry with all the other great qualities which adorn human nature, in the wonderful struggle he has conducted to a successful issue, tried what he could do to intimidate these Powers by the threat of closing the Canal. He was beaten, he gave way, he could not help giving way, he was reduced to a system of verbal protests, and in verbal protests alone he could find comfort and consolation, while the sifting, examining, and deciding upon the demands made upon the Maritime Powers took effect in the actual government of the Canal. What was our position in the matter? Were we great sufferers? On the contrary, we had the largest interest in the use of the Canal. We were, therefore, the natural leaders of the Maritime Powers; we urged what we thought just, and we obtained what we urged; and with the immense advantage of urging as the organ of the united interest of Europe, and not as the mouthpiece of an interest merely selfish. There was no risk of our being divided from the others, and as long as the Powers of Europe were united with us in our views as to the just management of the Canal we were certain to prevail. That is, I believe, a true statement of the condition of affairs as it was up to the month of November last. What then happened? The Khedive was under the necessity, not of selling his shares—the Khedive never proposed to sell his shares, it was not his doing—that is our plan, not his—the plan of the Government; some say it is the plan of Mr. Somebody, supported by Mr. Somebody else, and hence it came to be adopted; but of that I know nothing. All that I know is that it is the plan of Her Majesty's Government, and the House should recollect that the sale of the shares was not the plan of the Khedive. My right hon. Friend says we have to consider what political inconvenience would have resulted if we had allowed affairs to drift. I want to know from the Government whether they propose to show us the positive reasons which induced them to act in this manner. They have proceeded on the assumption that these reasons existed; they have set up the French shareholders and the French Company as a bugbear to frighten us out of our wits, and give us to understand that horrible consequences, which can be appreciated but hardly stated, would have followed if a Company having its locus in France had become the possessors of the shares of the Khedive. I want to know what were those great evils which could have accrued. If it had been a divided Company before, with two interests in it, and one had been French and the other anti-French, and the question had been about the withdrawal of one of the two, I could understand that there might have been a derangement of the equilibrium of the Company, and that some strong measure was necessary to prevent it. There was nothing of the kind. There was no interest in the Company adverse to the French interest. The Khedive had a great power over the Company, but not in his capacity of shareholder. The

Khedive had assured the Porte over and over again, that so far as regarded influence over the Company, those shares would have absolutely none whatever. Was the Company, then, a divided body? It was drilled under M. de Lesseps as an army under its commanding officer—they moved forward, halted, or receded, just as he chose to give the word of command. I mention this not to their disparagement, but simply as a matter of fact. Let me say one word for the French in this matter. We have been a little hard upon them. We did everything to prevent them from initiating this great enterprize for the benefit of mankind. They did initiate it for the benefit of mankind, and most of all for our benefit. The conduct of the French Government in this matter has never been to blame. They have regarded it as an enterprize as one of world-wide interest; they have not sought narrowly to promote their selfish interests through the medium of the position they had acquired; and it would be hard indeed to charge on them any intention which we have not the smallest right to impute to them of self-interest. I wish to know what were the new evils of a practical character which Her Majesty's Ministers apprehended would flow from the acquisition of these shares by others or by the French Government? That has never been stated, and ought to be pointed out. What we know is, the Company were perfectly united before, and any influence of the Khedive did not depend on his possession of these shares, but on his position as Governor of Egypt. But if the Government were to move at all, the natural and obvious course to take was to move on the lines the Khedive himself had laid down. Those lines were an advance of money on the security of the shares. If you were to move at all why not endeavour to construct a plan on that basis? A temporary advance of money on the security of the shares would have enabled you to look at the value of the shares, and if as a matter of business you did not think the security sufficient you might have called on the Khedive to throw in other equivalents to bring them up to the mark. You might have discussed the amount you had to advance. The country was entirely deluded when it was told by the Press that £4,000,000 was wanted immediately. No, the contract was that only £1,000,000 should be paid at once, and the remainder in two or three months, as a matter of arrangement between Messrs. Rothschild and the Khedive. Why was not that plan adopted? You are bound to show strong reasons against it. It is quite clear that under that plan some advantages would have been gained. First, you would not have made this signal invasion of the privileges of Parliament in disposing virtually of £4,000,000 without the sanction of the House of Commons. In the next place, you might have given us free judgments instead of a judgment which is not free; because you might have placed the matter before us in the interval whilst a temporary advance existed, and, as I have said, you might have secured yourselves by an examination of the securities, so as to be well assured of their condition and value. There would have been another advantage. You have said, and Lord Derby has said particularly, that what he desired was to bring the other Powers of Europe into partnership with the Government in the acquisition of the Canal. I wish to make a moment's reserve in speaking of international syndics and international arrangements. I wish to reserve my judgment in regard to them. Serious difficulty may sometimes arise in connection with them. In time of war I should like to know whether any international syndic or arrangement would be advantageous to this country. It appears to me that not only has nothing been gained by this arrangement in regard to the contingency of war, as to which Lord Derby is ominously silent, but much has been lost. That, however, is a matter on which I do not know that it is desirable or politic now to enter. I assume it was desirable—I assume it was creditable to our character that instead of entering into this transaction on our own footing and separating ourselves from the Powers of Europe, we should endeavour to make them art and part in the transaction. Had you taken the plan of the Khedive you could have done all that, and at the same time respected the privileges of Parliament. But you rejected his plan and you took your own. That entirely prevented you from taking Europe with you, and made it necessary to take into your own hands the functions of Parliament and setting precedent in that respect, which I am by no means sure we shall not have to take some specific step or measure to guard against its repetition. I hope the Government will give us some clear proof of the measure of what they thought fit to accomplish. Theirs is a position of great difficulty when they are asked this question—if you went so far, why did you not go further? The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), has defended the proceeding of the Government. Upon what ground has he defended it? On the ground that it is a first step—that it must be followed by other steps—that the only good and sufficient ground would be the acquisition of the entire Canal, and that the Government must move forward in that direction. Now I think we are entitled to ask the Government whether they can assure us that there is no risk or likelihood of their having to enter into other transactions and fresh outlays in consequence of this transaction. Upon this subject they have not favoured us with one word of explanation. But one thing they have done—although they have given us no explanation why they did so—they refused the offer which the Khedive made to them. The Khedive had offered them the opportunity of purchasing what are sometimes called “the founder’s shares”—I do not know that the expression is a very accurate one, for the Khedive was not the founder of the Canal—I would rather call them the 15 per cent shares; but the Government having received the proposal to purchase these 15 per cent shares appeared to have been fastidious, and suddenly became shocked with the idea of entering into so speculative a transaction. They said they did not feel disposed to enter into a speculative purchase of that kind. I assume that the Khedive was to be believed in the representations he made. If we do not believe what he said there are some important consequences that will follow. The Khedive had never pretended that what we bought would give us influence on the Company. The Government set up that doctrine, not the Khedive; but he said—If you purchase the founder’s shares they will give you control over the Company; they will carry with them greater power of control over the Company than the possession of the shares would give. I want to know what is the difference between a speculative and a non-speculative purchase. We have purchased shares which carry no dividend at all for 19 years, and for dividends on which we are then dependent on the simple promise of the Khedive. The Khedive offers shares of which it does not seem too much to hope that in four or five years they may begin to bear some dividend, and before 10 years will bear a large dividend. We accepted the first of these as a safe and complete transaction, and the second was rejected as a speculative purchase. I want to know on what grounds the Government considered themselves entitled to buy shares that carry dividend only after 19 years, and at the same time declined to purchase other shares that bear 5 per cent and in a few years would bear 10 per cent, although these were recommended to them as carrying direct influence over this Company which they were so anxious to control? I own I cannot see on what ground it is if you have gone so far why you can refuse to go further. That is a portion of the case which the Government have not yet attempted to explain. The grand object of this great operation—for such it is—was to obtain additional security for free transit to the East. A distinguished Gentleman who lately solicited the suffrages of the electors of Manchester intimated to the constituency of that great City—if he is correctly reported—that nothing could be more monstrous than to raise a doubt of the wisdom of this transaction—for, he said, Is not the Prince of Wales in India, and is not the Princess of Wales in England, and are we going to put the Prince to the hazard of not coming home by the nearest route? That may have been one of the main objects which the right hon. Gentleman had in view; and if so, I want to know in what definite and specific manner we have obtained additional securities for the free transit of the Canal to India. I confine myself in the main to putting questions, and I am afraid that I have put a great many and have a great many still to put; because I contend that we are by no means informed as to all the bearings of this transaction, and that there is a moiety of it with respect to which the Government have never given an explanation, but, on the contrary, have been remarkably, I will not say ominously, silent. I apprehend that additional security for free passage to

India is but one meaning of what may be understood by additional control over the proceedings of the Company. I want to know in what way you obtain control over the proceedings of the Company within the precincts of the Company itself. I have shown already that we have had a most powerful, effective, and, I think, sufficient control over the proceedings of the Company from without. But in what way are we to have it from within? In only one of two ways can the ingenuity of man show it to be possible. One way is by obtaining a majority of votes; the other is by showing an identity of interests. Have you obtained a majority of votes? Ten votes are what you either knew, or did not know that you were to obtain, and even those 10 votes are subject to criticism. They have never been admitted as of right. M. de Lesseps seems to have admitted them for a practical reason — there was a great difficulty in making a quorum at his meetings, and these 10 votes afforded him useful assistance. But at any time when it suits intrigue or policy the claim to vote which the possession of these shares gives may be questioned. And where, if questioned, will it be decided? It will be decided in a Court of France, in which Her Majesty will have to appear as plaintiff, with the Suez Canal Company as defendants; or, if not in a Court of France, in a Court of Egypt, but certainly not in a Court of England. I cannot think that Her Majesty's Government gave sufficient consideration to what is due to the dignity of the Crown when they not only accepted thankfully but sought eagerly the peculiar position in which they have placed the Crown for the establishment of its rights as a shareholder in the Suez Canal Company. But it is admitted that you have not got the votes, and it is said you are going to send three directors to a Council consisting, I believe, of 22. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Reduced to 21.] Well, that is an inducement, but I am afraid not an effective one; and I want to know what will be the position of those three Gentlemen who, possessing the confidence of Her Majesty's Government, are to endeavour to exercise that control over the proceedings of the Suez Canal Company which the British public, in the tempest of its approval two or three months ago, considered and were told by the metropolitan Press they were to acquire. They cannot do it by votes. Can they do it by showing identity of interests? Now, I ask you, as men of business, whether there is an identity of interests in a joint-stock company between shareholders who have a dividend for 19 years, and shareholders who have no concern with that dividend, but derive their interest from other sources, and with respect to whom it makes no difference whether the returns are small or large. Of course, questions will arise between the two classes of shareholders about dividends or repairs, liberal or stinted administration, and extension or otherwise. The one will argue for repairs, for liberal administration, for great extension; they will point to the future, and draw glowing pictures of what the property will become if a liberal policy is pursued. But the answer will be—"That is all very fine; but we have wives and children to look to, and we want our dividends for the next 19 years. You must go back to London and tell your Government, your metropolitan Press, and your Parliament, if you want these improvements you must pay for them; you must come down liberally out of the resources drawn from the vast wealth of the country you represent. If you bear a large share in the work of improvement, then we shall listen to you, but not unless you consent to accept those fair and equal conditions." I again want to know whether I am not correct in saying these questions deserve an answer:—First of all, whether, if you are to control the proceedings of the Company, your control must not be dependent upon an available majority of votes, or else upon an identity of interests with the other shareholders; and also whether it is not true that, as far as regards in round numbers a period of 20 years, the interests of the British Government as shareholders are not identical with, but are in positive opposition to, the interests of the other shareholders, inasmuch as the wants of shareholders of the Canal and the wants of the mercantile community are not the same? What one party will want, will be the improvement of the Canal; what the other, will be the maximum of dividend. I am afraid that is the answer we shall get when we are preaching the sound doctrines that we shall preach to our brother shareholders. There is no doubt that, in regard to the ultimate interests of the enterprize, the shareholders and the customers of the Canal are in the same position. That is what called "the long run." But "the long run" does not and never can govern, except to a limited extent, the conduct of such a Company, let it be ever so enterprising. The shareholders of this Company, whom we did our best to keep out of their dividends for a length of time, will naturally think we have no further claims upon them. On the other hand, I am inclined to think that they will make claims which will induce Her Majesty's Government to run the very unpleasant risk of drawing upon the Exchequer—a thing of which Her Majesty's Government did not dream, and of which most certainly they did not give us any intimation whatever. And if we are to do so, let us consider what it will come to. I am very confident what it will come to. I saw it in the newspapers to-day—I do not know whether it is true, but we are told—that Mr. Cave and M. de Lesseps have arrived at an arrangement for increasing the burden on the trade which passes through the Canal. I cannot believe that such an arrangement is possible, because down to this date we have been contending that we have acted only in the common interest of the Maritime Powers; and, further, it does not belong to anybody except the Porte and those very Maritime Powers to determine whether the charge shall be reduced or increased. But I am not now arguing for an increased burden on vessels using the Canal. I am contending that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is at a future date to come down and say how vast the importance of this Canal will be to us, and as we cannot induce our brother shareholders to benefit us out of their own pockets he has to ask Parliament to make a large advance for the improvement of the Canal, then comes in another view—that the general taxpayers of the country may be called upon to subsidize one particular branch of our trade, the Indian trade, which makes such large use of the Canal. I must own that I am not without considerable fears and misgivings in regard to the ultimate operation of this precedent. I hold it to be of the greatest importance that we had formerly a complete identity of interest with other States in the Canal; our ground was sound and immovable, and might have remained so as long as you made your demands as the champions of the general interests of Europe. I am sorry I am not now looking at an isolated scheme, in which capacity alone it is presented to us; but that we are now to have a separate, and what will be called a selfish, interest of our own. It seems to me that we run a very great risk in abandoning that community and identity of position with the other Powers which we have hitherto enjoyed. Nor do I believe that you can at all be certain that you will be free from invidious—unmerited, no doubt—but invidious and inconvenient reproaches and suspicions. I am not by any means sure that you will not give a handle to any Government with which you may happen to be at variance to use against you, as a means of intrigue and opposition, this position which you have, I am afraid, unwisely chosen to adopt. Then that complexity of relations between the Company and the Powers may occasion possibly very serious embarrassments. Some Powers may go to Egypt and set up an influence against us; others may go to the Porte and do the same. Every sort of claim may be made against us; and there is no certain tribunal of public law to which you can bring these claims, and no clear and positive rule by which to dispose of them. It was easy to dispose of them, however, so long as we had Europe on our side. It will be very difficult to dispose of them when it is only our own interest that we have to protect. Now, before I conclude, I must look for a moment at the finance of my right hon. Friend, and here I must say, that of the useful art of building there is one branch in which my right hon. Friend promises to become a great expert; and that is the art of what is called "castle-building." My right hon. Friend coolly handles this 5 per cent which the Khedive promises, analyzes it, considers it under the head of capital, and tells us how many years you will have your interest, and then get your shares for nothing. How is all this achieved? Without the slightest difficulty. The transaction is not to be lost in the general accounts of the expenditure and income of the country. That would obscure the glory which he hopes the Government in this matter will obtain. And all that he takes on trust, and entirely irrespective of the question whether we are ever to get the money or not. Are we, however, to get it; and, if so, what assurance have we that we shall get it? I want to know, in the first place, whether this is a prior or a preferential charge upon the revenues of Egypt. If I read the letter of Lord Derby to General Stanton, I find that the latter is to impress upon the Government of Egypt that this is to be a primary charge; but in the agreement that is signed by General Stanton on behalf of the British Government there is nothing about this being a primary or a preferential charge, but merely that it is to be a charge upon the revenues of Egypt. But, even assuming that it is to be a primary or a preferential charge, I am far from thinking that even in that case we should be altogether out of the wood. Taking into consideration the critical position of Egypt with reference to its finances, and the abuses which the right hon. Gentleman describes as prevailing in its administration, it would, I think, scarcely be consistent with the honour and dignity of the British Crown to avail itself of its political influence for the purpose of enforcing this prior charge against the other creditors of that country, entitled under prior engagements. In that, as I gather, my right hon. Friend agrees with me. I think, however, on a careful perusal of both the documents to which I have referred, that Lord Derby is mistaken, and that we are to have no prior charge on the Egyptian revenues. And if that be so, what is the security we are to have for the payment of this money? Is it to be the same security as the other creditors of Egypt have? I ask, therefore—and upon this point I think we must press for a reply—have the Government or have they not a reasonable conviction that for the next 20 years, at any rate, the Egyptian Government will be in a condition and will be willing to meet its engagements? The right hon. Gentleman is asking us to vote money upon the faith of the promise of the Khedive, and what are the inducements he holds out to us to vote that money? He tells us he has sent out a Commission of Inquiry to Egypt, and that the result of the Inquiry instituted by that Commission has convinced him of three things—I care little for those three things, because the right hon. Gentleman might have been easily satisfied with regard to them without going to the trouble of sending out a Commission of Inquiry. I care for a fourth, about which his Commission tells us nothing. The three things of which the right hon. Gentleman tells us he is convinced are—first, that the resources of Egypt are great; secondly, that the sins and offences of its financial administration are great also; and, thirdly, that if a thorough repentance take possession of the offenders and that everything now wrong be set right, that if in this Mahomedan country, in this little organized country, and in this absolute country, good sound normal systems of finance be forthwith introduced and steadily maintained, then very likely its finances will be placed on a sound basis. I feel very much disposed to agree in all three of these propositions. But, at the same time, I know that when deep and inveterate disease has taken possession of the finances of a country, it is not in a day, nor a year, nor in 10 years, that it can be eradicated, and the financial system restored to a healthy condition. There is not a country on earth that has so little excuse as Egypt for having its finances in disorder. It was the country where the Sovereign was richest, where the soil was richest; it was the country where the rule was most absolute; it was the country where the subject was the most obedient; it was the country which had no European responsibilities to discharge. The Turks may have had their difficulties, and their ideas of maintaining a great army or a great navy; but the Emperor of Russia was not going to attack Egypt. Egypt, therefore, had no occasion and no excuse for any portion of that profligate expenditure which has brought her to the position in which she now is. How, therefore, am I to expect that such a moral miracle can be effected as that Egypt will reform her financial administration, and that the stroke of the right hon. Gentleman in furtherance of his Oriental policy will conduce to a complete revolution in the finances of the country, will drag them from the depths to which they have sunk, and will bring them into a condition of comparative purity, soundness, health, and vigour, which even in this country has been the slow attainment of long labours and of many generations? Is it not surprising that my right hon. Friend, who is so circum-spect that he will not give us anything but "if" on which to feed our hopes, yet coolly opens the money-box, reckons the interest, and says—"In a few years it will all be right if this, that, or the other is done, and that we shall get our shares in the Suez Canal for nothing?" I wish to know from the Government—and I must press them for a reply—whether we are to have the same security for the payment of this 5 per cent as the general creditor of Egypt has for the payment of his interest. At one time it occurred to me that so great were the embarrassments and apprehensions connected, not with the present future, for we must look beyond that, but with the possible evolutions of this magnificent policy, that really it was a consideration whether it would not be well to take all these shares and divide them amongst the Members of the Cabinet, asking them to accept them as a small acknowledgment of their services in this transaction from a grateful country. I am by no means certain even now that that would be a bad bargain. I have great apprehensions, as I have said, about the receipt of this 5 per cent; but I have much greater apprehensions as to the position into which the necessity of calling them up may draw us. That is a question of the most serious character. I will suppose a case. We have no doubt that for a year, or perhaps a little more, everything will be made smooth, easy, and admirably punctual, and the right hon. Gentleman may sleep calmly on his pillow, so far as the Egyptian payment is concerned, for the coming financial year. But I go beyond the year, and I will assume that the moral miracle anticipated by the Treasury Bench does not take place, and that these financial embarrassments occur. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day, hearing that the money is not likely to be forthcoming—and such things do happen in Eastern countries—desires General Stanton to go to the Khedive of Egypt and say to him—"You will be required, you know, to pay that £100,000 punctually on the 1st of June next." The Khedive will say to him—"I can pay. I do not deny that I can pay. I will show you the money, and you shall see everything—what are the expenses of government, and what funds are available. I can pay it; but if I do I cannot pay the dividend of a prior creditor, which will become payable on the 1st of July." That is a position in which I do not wish to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer of this country, competing with other creditors of the Khedive of Egypt for payment of this money, when it will be obtained only by taking the money out of the pockets of those who made their contract with the Khedive before you made yours. Nor am I sure that this is the last or the worst difficulty; because I think it is perfectly possible that if the pressure upon this or some other Khedive becomes very inconvenient, there may be other Powers who, feeling a resentment at the severe pressure put by a great Power like England upon a small Power like Egypt, will speak honeyed words in the ear of the Khedive, and propose arrangements of mutual accommodation to bring about relations upsetting all ours, with the possibility of very inconvenient and mischievous results. These are the political apprehensions that occur to me, and indeed wherever I move on this subject the ground seems mined under my feet. I have asked Her Majesty's Government a number of questions upon this subject, and I most sincerely hope that they will be able to give replies that will satisfy me, and, what is of far greater importance, will satisfy this House and the country. I do not speak of this as a matter on which I desire to dogmatize. I say that this question is full of difficulties, and that they have not been solved—that it is full of knots, and that they have not been untied. It may be that it was necessary to move in this matter; it may be that this was the right way to move; it may be that your financial arrangements are consistent with precedent, with constitutional rule, and with prudence; it may be that you will show a justification for your remarkable invasion of the privileges of the House of Commons in virtually disposing of this money without its consent; it may be that political embarrassments are not likely to follow, as I fear they may, the step you have taken; it may be that our influence over the Canal Company will be augmented, and that in that sense our security for free passage to India improved—all these things may be capable of truth, but I strongly assert that of not one of them down to the present hour has proof been given.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it is impossible to follow a speech like that to which we have just listened without admitting the very great force and the very great ingenuity of many of the arguments of my right hon. Friend. Our position, respective or ir-respective of the step we have taken in the purchase of these particular shares, is one which is certainly open to complications, and undoubtedly—whatever may be the position which we shall hold with respect to the possession of shares in the Suez Canal—many of these inconveniences which the fertile imagination of my right hon. Friend has placed in so powerful a light before the House are inconveniences which it is quite possible may occur, and which we must prepare, if they do occur, to meet as they arise. It is impossible to deny that complications may arise with foreign countries, or with Egypt, or with the different interests concerned in the maintenance and navigation of the Suez Canal in consequence of our purchase of these shares, and that we may require efforts of statesmanship, prudence, and courage to deal with them. But the question we have to determine is, whether the difficulties which my right hon. Friend tells us are inevitable would not have been quite as formidable, or even more formidable, had we not purchased these shares; and whether had we held aloof in the matter the dangers foreshadowed by him might not have been precipitated; and whether, by the step which we have taken, we have not put ourselves in a position of greater advantage to meet them, if they should arise, or, which I rather anticipate, to prevent them from arising? I greatly regret that in the statement I made the other day I was considered to have been too concise in my exposition of the views of the Government with respect to the purchase of these shares; but the real truth was, I thought that it was a matter which I had better simply bring before the Committee, by way of opening the case, and I was rather disposed to wait for questions that might be raised by the Committee than to excuse, and thereby accuse, our proceedings on points on which they might never be challenged, or to enter on a discussion of questions on which I should think there was no difference of opinion. But after the speeches of the two right hon. Gentlemen, I feel that further explanations are called for; and I therefore wish, in the first place, to clear my statement of one difficulty which I think was imported into it by the line which my right hon. Friend who has just sat down has taken, not only on this, but on a former occasion. I wish to clear my position of any connection with language that may have been held by the Metropolitan Press. It is enough for us to have to explain and defend our own policy; and we are not to be held liable for the language used by the Press with which we have no connection. Although we were told that certain articles were inspired, and were evidently the language of Her Majesty's Government, my Colleagues and myself say there is no foundation at all for any such statement. When the matter was finally settled we undoubtedly, as we were bound, communicated the fact of the purchase of the shares to persons who communicated it to the organs of public information, and that, I believe, is the whole extent of our connection with the matter. For any inferences that were drawn from it the Press are entirely responsible. Well, setting that aside, I turn to a question on which a good deal of stress has been laid. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London began, I think, by asking us what was the real question which the House had to decide, and my right hon. Friend put a somewhat similar question. They asked—"What are the relations of the Government with Messrs. Rothschild?" They also asked—"What is this Vote which you are asking for? Is it one which lies within the power of Parliament to decide and vote upon freely or not?"—and coupled with that question were important questions which my right hon. Friend raised with the usual force of his language as to our Constitutional position and the propriety of the conduct which we had pursued, and which he very seriously and gravely impugned. Well, I think that to a certain extent the second of those questions very much answers the first. We are told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London that, after all, the vote which we are asking the House of Commons to give upon this occasion is a mere form, because it is absolutely necessary that Parliament should confirm the action taken by Her Majesty's Government; and that there can be no question whatever as to the decision of the House. But almost in the same breath my right hon. Friend challenges us to show that our proceedings have not been of a most unconstitutional and objectionable character. Why, I must say that it seems to me something like an affront to the House of Commons to suppose that the House, as a matter of course, should confirm proceedings which may be of a most unconstitutional and objectionable character. If our proceedings had been admitted to be perfectly regular in all respects, if the only question was whether our policy was an advantageous or a disadvantageous policy upon some question as to whether we ought to have given so much for the shares, a little more or a little less, then I admit that it might have been said—"This is a foregone conclusion." But when my right hon. Friend turns round upon us and says—"You have done the most unprecedented thing that ever was done in the present century, and you are now asking the House of Commons to confirm what may be a most mischievous transaction," it is inconsistent to say—"After all, it is a matter of course that Parliament should approve it." It was a transaction in which we felt, and those with whom we were connected in this matter must also have felt, that it was a case which required full and careful consideration, and in which we should come before Parliament to ask for its free and unbiased judgment. Now, that is important, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London almost admitted in so many words that the reason he impressed upon us the obligation which he said lay upon Parliament in this matter was, that he wished to make it the foundation of his argument that Messrs. Rothschild in undertaking this bargain ran no risk, and that we had consequently made an improvident bargain. I say, on the contrary, the challenge thrown out by my right hon. Friend to show that this unprecedented action is not one that deserves censure and repudiation by the House of Commons proves that the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London is not a just view of the matter. Well, I think the transaction was unprecedented.

The whole policy and connection of the British Government with an undertaking of this character are unprecedented, just as the Suez Canal itself is unprecedented. And undoubtedly the conduct of the Government could not be precisely in accordance with any precedent in a matter in which precedents did not exist. Well, now, what was our policy? We have given a history of this transaction more than once to Parliament, but I must revert to it. My right hon. Friend said just now the question of a purchase of shares was not one initiated by the Khedive; it was initiated by the British Government. Now, I will ask the House to notice what the precise steps were. We had it brought before us that the Khedive was thinking of raising money upon his shares. The probable terms were stated, and we at once perceived that the money would be advanced at an exorbitant rate of interest for a short period upon the security of these shares, and that when that short period expired he would be unable to discharge it. The obligations of the loan might be renewed, until at length the Khedive would be driven to part with his shares under circumstances of embarrassment. We saw that there was danger of his falling into what would be a very disadvantageous arrangement, and we used our friendly influence with the Khedive to induce him not to mortgage his valuable property. Now, we perfectly knew what the general circumstances in Egypt were. We knew quite well that one of the errors of the Viceroy of Egypt had been his parting from time to time with property valuable in itself and promising to be more valuable in the future, at ridiculously low prices, and we saw that if he were to go on in that way, it must be bad for the condition of that country, in which we took, and justly took, an interest. Well, we advised him not to obtain a loan upon his shares, and we made him an offer—that if we were able to assist him by purchasing the shares, and if fair terms could be arranged, we were ready to consider the matter. The proceedings went on. The Khedive still from time to time was making further arrangements until the last point arrived, at which he told us he was now prepared to sell his shares, that he had had an offer of £4,000,000 for the purchase of these shares, but that he gave us the first refusal of becoming the purchasers. We saw that it was then time to act at once, and that the only course which was open to us was to make a purchase. My right hon. Friend says—"You might have made an advance, that would have been all right; but to purchase them was unconstitutional." Really I am unable to perceive the distinction between the constitutional character of the one or the other proceeding. My right hon. Friend also says—"You ought to have gone to the Bank of England." Well, I admit that, as a general rule, if this had been a question in which we were proceeding upon some regular authority from Parliament as in any ordinary transaction, we ought to have applied to the Bank of England to undertake the operation for us. But that was not the position of the case. We knew that we were taking a step outside of strict law, and we had to consider whether we should be in the right in asking a public body like the Bank of England, with a public obligation, to concur in that breach, which would have involved a breach of the law on their part also. We had also to consider whether, if we addressed ourselves to the Bank of England, there would be time to conclude the bargain. We knew that if we addressed ourselves to the Bank of England the Directors would have to meet and consider the proposal, and decide whether or not they could entertain it. If they could not have entertained it, where should we have been? It was a question whether the Bank would have taken the responsibility of conducting this unprecedented transaction in a manner equally unprecedented, and in the manner most suitable for the attainment of the object. The question, therefore, is whether, by giving such an invitation to the Bank of England, we should not have run the risk of losing the object we desired. This is a matter on which I can only say that we acted with the best motives and the best intentions; and if we were wrong we must submit to any rebuke which Parliament may bestow upon us. We, however, believe that Parliament will approve and support what we have done. But this I will say—that our action was taken simply and solely because we believed it to be the only way in which, under the circumstances of the moment, we could secure the object at which we were aiming. Now, we are asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London whether, when we took this step, we really knew what we were about. Well, I hope we did. The right hon. Gentleman challenges me for not having been thoroughly honest in saying at the time we made the purchase, that we were pretty well acquainted with the circumstances as to the votes. He especially asks us—"Did you or did you not know that you would only have 10 votes by this purchase?" And he says—"You could not have known it, because the metropolitan Press the next day did not know it." But, Sir, there are cases in which the Government may know more even than the Press, and I can assure the Committee that I personally was perfectly well aware of the fact, and, not only so, but that I represented it to my Colleagues, and they were perfectly aware of it also. We had at that time in this country, as has been mentioned before, a gentleman who was thoroughly conversant with the condition and with all the circumstances of the Company. I refer to Colonel Stokes, with whom Lord Derby and I myself were in repeated communication during the week these negotiations were on foot, and of course it was our duty to make ourselves acquainted with all that Colonel Stokes could tell us on the subject. Now, this particular question—"Would the shares carry a proportionate number of votes?" was one of the questions that were put. Most distinctly we had before us the statutes of the Company, which showed that no shareholder could have more than 10 votes, and although, of course, there might be the possibility of breaking up our interest into a large number of faggot votes, yet we felt that we must look upon it as a purchase which would entitle us only to 10 votes. We were further informed as to the question that was raised whether the shares had any votes at all. But we were also advised that the better opinion was that the shares, though detached from the coupons, would carry such votes as properly belonged to them, and that was a very important consideration to us. The Committee will see the reason of that. It is said that it would be unreasonable that persons holding shares which were not receiving dividend should have a vote on the same footing as persons holding shares which were receiving dividend. On the other hand, it would be unreasonable to say that 176,000 shares should not be represented at all; and if they were not represented by people who held the shares without the coupons, by whom were they represented? Not by the people who had the coupons without the shares; for that had already been tried and decided; and it was perfectly clear, according to the decision of a French Court, that the holders of the délégations had not the votes. The Company have raised a question whether anybody has the votes; and that remains still to be tried. But I may observe, in passing, that in the communications which we have recently had with M. de Lesseps he has expressed his readiness to admit the right of these shares to have the votes. [An hon. MEMBER: The 10?] No; but that these shares should carry votes, notwithstanding the coupons being cut off. And what I wish the right hon. Gentleman to remember is that there are always two sides to this question. It was not only what we gained, but what we prevented. If we only gained 10 votes, we at all events prevented the creation of 700 or more by other people. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say that there would be no great harm in a certain additional number of other persons coming in; but I think a great change in the constitution of the Company, such as might have been expected by the sale of these shares, carrying 700 votes, to persons who might have got hold of them was not altogether a matter of indifference to us. My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich says—"You were, very well as you were before. I do not say you were quite in a comfortable position, because the Foreign Office was worried; but, setting aside the misfortunes of the poor Foreign Office clerks, or even, occasionally, of the Foreign Secretary, you were on a footing that was fairly satisfactory. You had your fights, indeed, with the Company, but you had the Porte and the Khedive with you, and though M. de Lesseps might threaten as he pleased, you carried your points against him. Why, then, could you not let the matter alone?" Our answer, Sir, is that the matter would not let itself alone. The situation was changing, and changing not by our wish. Our wish was that the Khedive should retain his shares, and that things should go on as before;

that the conclusions of the Conference at Constantinople should be carried into effect, and that matters should be satisfactorily carried on upon the old footing. But we found that that would no longer be the case. The right hon. Gentleman says—"How were you affected by the Khedive selling his shares? The Khedive told the Porte that it was not these shares which gave him his influence over the Canal. Why did you not buy 'the founder's shares' at 15 per cent, which the Khedive himself says would have given you a greater control than the others?" But what does he mean by saying that the control would have been "greater?" Greater than what? If it would have been greater, that very supposition implies that you must gain some control through acquiring the shares that you have obtained. The thing is palpable to everybody. The influence attaching to this transaction is not to be measured merely by the number of votes at command. Really it is not worth while, even out of respect to my right hon. Friend opposite, to argue so plain a proposition as that in possessing something like two-fifths of the shares you have more influence, and must have more influence, in the affairs of the Company than you had before. Why, look at what has occurred within even the very short time that has elapsed since this purchase. We have practically arranged for the admission of a certain number of our nominees into the administration of the Company. Why did we get that? How does it happen that M. de Lesseps is willing to give us that, unless it is that he finds that our new step has given us more influence than we had before? I do not like to put what may be thought invidious cases; I do not like to say what you might do; nor is it prudent or desirable that you should; but if my right hon. Friend would only consider how, if he were trying how he could exercise his influence, were he unscrupulous in the use of these shares, he would see very well how he could exercise an influence which the rest of the shareholders could not neglect. Is it not an advantage to the Canal Company that two-fifths of its shares should be solidly held by the British Government? And would it be no disadvantage to the Company if the British Government were to part with its shares and throw them on the market? In a case of this sort it may be said that shares weigh rather than count, and consequently there are many ways in which the influence we have and must have by the acquisition of the shares will tell. But what I look upon as much more important is, that we are put in a better position from a moral point of view in the arguments we may hold on this matter. Does my right hon. Friend not remember—for he appears to be very familiar with the correspondence—how, in the course of those controversies which preceded the Conference of Constantinople, the French Government put forward this view? They said—"We are bound to support the French shareholders, who made this Canal, against the English shipowners who use it." And though that argument was overruled for the time, is it quite certain that it would always be overruled? Is it not better that we should be able to say that we are not only customers and shipowners, but we hold a double position, having likewise a large property as shareholders in the Canal; and when we ask you to consider the interest of those who use the Canal, we are not speaking selfishly only, for we know that if sacrifices have to be made we can and must bear our fair share of them? It is said that there may be very heavy works to be constructed in connection with the Canal, and that claims will be made upon us on account of them. I do not know how that may be, but I do not believe it. I stated the other day, according to our best information, that it is not so probable as it seemed to be a short time ago that very heavy works will be necessary for the Canal. As it develops, I do not say that money may not be laid out to make it more available and more useful for shipping and for commerce. That may have to be considered and arranged hereafter. But I want to point out that this is not a matter that arises from your being the possessors of a certain number of shares. If works have to be carried out of an extensive character, as some imagine will be the case, although I do not, the Company may have to ask those who are interested in the Canal to assist, and then we shall be called upon. Therefore, we do not take upon ourselves any new responsibility; but if any further expenditure should really have to be incurred by the Company, we may have to bear

our proportion of it. There now remains the mission of Mr. Cave, and what I have forborne to dwell upon, the part Messrs. Rothschild have taken in the transaction, for I do not know strictly what it has to do with the question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London said that we ought to have added £37,000 for the interest which we have to pay to the Messrs. Rothschild. I confess I do not understand how that item could be included in the Vote, nor what we have, strictly speaking, to do with it. The arrangement with the Khedive was that from the moment that the purchase was effected, or that advances began to be made to him, he should begin to pay interest on the advances at the rate of 5 per cent; and the agreement with Messrs. Rothschild was that they should charge a commission of 2½ per cent upon the £4,000,000, and that they should receive the 5 per cent interest which the Khedive undertook to pay upon the amounts advanced from the date of the advance until the date of repayment by the British Government. Consequently, when we take the advances on ourselves—when we borrow or in any other way raise money for the purpose of recouping the Messrs. Rothschild, we step into their position. From that moment we become entitled to the 5 per cent the Khedive has promised. This is a very simple matter, and as far as I can see it is one which could not possibly have come under this Vote. The money will be paid by the Khedive, and it matters little whether it is to one person or to another.

MR. LOWE: Messrs. Rothschild's bargain is that we should pay it, and it is their bargain rather than what is in the Treasury Minute that we should look to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: At all events, if we have to provide anything in the way of interest for Messrs. Rothschild, it will only be the same amount as we shall receive on the other hand from the Khedive; and I do not see that this Vote has anything to do with the arrangement. When we come to the final arrangement for raising the money and paying it, that will be a better time to discuss it than now. As to the other matter I referred to, the right hon. Gentleman was very merry over the proceedings in connection with the mission of my right hon. Friend Mr. Cave. He said that, according to the request made to us by the Khedive, all we need have done was to have sent out two young men, one from the Treasury and the other from the Inland Revenue Office; that we should have let them go out, and then—God bless them! Well, as I explained the other day, although that might seem a very simple step to take, yet it would have been giving a certain amount of British patronage to the financial administration of the Khedive. We could not but feel that any step of that sort—I mean sending out two clerks to assist the Khedive, not at his Board of Trade or in his Post Office, but in his finances—would be open to a construction which it was desirable to avoid, unless we knew what we were about. We felt, therefore, that we ought to do either more or less than he asked us—either to send nobody at all, which would have been somewhat unfriendly, or to inform ourselves fully as to the position of affairs, in order that we might send some one capable of doing what was needed. Accordingly, we sent out Mr. Cave, and I do not deny that in sending him out one of our objects was to learn for ourselves the position and true prospects of the finances of Egypt. We told the Khedive so, and he received Mr. Cave fully in that spirit, and with great friendliness and frankness. I do not want to enter into the subject of Mr. Cave's mission—that will be better discussed at another time. I merely wish to deny that we entered into the matter with the intention of surrounding our policy in Egypt with a great halo of glory. Our object, I repeat, was simply to see clearly what we were about, and to give what assistance we could to our friend the Khedive. For, after all, where is the limit to be drawn of the assistance that one nation may give in this way to another? If you advised a nation with regard to its policy—if you stepped forward and said, for instance—"You are entering upon an unwise or impolitic war," all the world would say you were taking a friendly step, and one that became a wise and friendly Power in regard to a less wise neighbour. Well, when you see a friendly country squandering its resources, when you see it engaged in financial courses which you know to be bad and which must lead to embarrassment; when you see that this embarrassment may, and probably will, affect not only that country, but European Powers—and I would here remind the House that Egypt lies on the highway of Europe to the East—when you recollect what advantage might be taken of the embarrassment of that country by some European Power, and how the peace of Europe might thereby be jeopardized, it is surely good policy to come forward and prevent that country from getting into difficulties. Therefore I say, even if there were more objections to be made to the details of this transaction, there are high political considerations to be kept in view which ought to carry it over any merely commercial criticisms. I do not look upon it as a business transaction; as a purely business transaction it is not justifiable. It would not have been becoming on our part to have speculated in shares, and that was one of the main reasons why we objected to purchase the 15 per cent of the Khedive. It was not necessary for our purpose to do so; we had already obtained our voice in the Canal, and to have purchased that 15 per cent—although, as my right hon. Friend says, they might have paid—did not appear to us to be a transaction worthy of this great country, or of the policy which we have been pursuing. That reminds me of another point which requires notice. I was asked—"Is your £200,000 to be treated as a primary charge on the revenues of Egypt?" My right hon. Friend who put the question gave an answer to it himself, with which I intimated my concurrence. It is not a primary charge. The reason why these words "primary charge" come in is this—The Khedive had sold his shares to us, and had charged the Revenue of Egypt with the payment to us of a certain annuity in respect of them. After that came proposals for parting with other property, and it was offered to us, for we were asked to purchase the 15 per cent which he is entitled to receive of the net profits of the Canal; and at the same time there were rumours—I am not sure they were not on the high authority of the metropolitan Press itself—to the effect that the Khedive was still further entertaining proposals of parting with other property; and what we wished to impress on him was—Do not part with the property, because, remember, we have a charge upon it; we have not, strictly speaking, a primary charge, but we have a prior charge upon the revenues of Egypt in respect of that £200,000. We cautioned him, in fact, against parting with property which was mortgaged to us, and that is the explanation of the words in question. I am sorry that I am unable to go more fully into the matter; but if there is any question which any hon. Gentleman may desire to put, the Government will be most happy to afford any information which they can. But I do hope that there is no doubt of what the general views of the Committee will be. They will look upon the matter as one which they have a perfect right to criticize; and if they should think that it is one in connection with which there are any particulars as to which the Government may be worthy of blame, let them not be restrained from attributing it; but I say that the course which we have pursued embodies a national policy, and I believe that it will be supported by this Committee.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he desired to express his sense of the purchase by Her Majesty's Government of the Khedive's shares in the Suez Canal, and he hoped that many hon. Members unfettered by official responsibility in the past or the present would do so likewise. To his mind it was ignoring the real question and the true position of this case to discuss it as if it were analogous to the investment, speculative or otherwise, of a private person. He did not regard it, nor did he believe the public would regard it, in that light. They would regard it as an important act of State policy, one which the Government had undertaken for high political considerations. The subject was one which ought to be clearly discussed apart from ordinary Party considerations. It was an Imperial question, and one that bore upon the commercial interests of this country in the very highest degree. After all that had been said with respect to the case of this Canal, it was not his intention to recapitulate the circumstances connected with its construction. He must, however, again remind the Committee of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in the days of Lord Palmerston, when the project of the Suez Canal was first mooted. At the time M. de Lesseps brought it under the notice of the English Government, his advances were repelled with coldness. He was not now about to cast censure, or even to make censorious reflections, upon the Government of Lord Palmerston. The right hon. Gentlemen and noble Lords who formed Her Majesty's Government at that time acted, he had no doubt, according to their lights, or perhaps he should rather refer their conduct to the obscurity in which the future lay veiled; but in these later days, with the experience that they had had, with the light of the blazing sun of Egypt glancing its evidence of the victory of M. de Lesseps all along the line from Port Said to Suez, should not their conduct be far different from what it was then? He asked what it was that they had to censure the Government for? The position of the Sovereign of England on this last occasion somewhat resembled that of the Roman Monarch who, having refused to pay a certain price for nine volumes, and then for six, finally paid the same price for three. Were they now to censure Her Majesty's Government because they had closed with this last offer, rather than allow the Sibyl to depart once more to destroy the volumes which remained? He would, however, deal with the subject apart from metaphor. It was asked by right hon. Gentlemen what security had they that the promissory notes for £200,000 a-year would be paid? He answered, not much greater security for the 19 years than the Khedive had given in regard to the fulfilment of his other engagements. But assuming he did not pay the £200,000 a-year, was it right that they should discuss at the present time what should be the measure to be adopted on such a contingency? Hon. Members should bear in mind that the Khedive of Egypt, as the Egyptian Government, was entitled to the reversion, after 93 years, of the Canal, and was not that a security to this country? For these reasons he believed that Her Majesty's Government were perfectly right in entering into the bargain, and he heartily supported the Vote.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD said, he entirely concurred with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government in the matter was a perfectly wise and proper one. It was a matter of some surprise to him that neither in the public Press nor in that House had there been any reference to the paramount importance of the Suez Canal to our Australian Colonies. The whole tenour of the debate was, that the Canal was the key to India; but no reference had been made to the vast interest the question had with regard to Australasia, the population of which might already be counted by millions, and which in 40 years would have a population equal to that of England. He hoped the Vote would be granted without a division—first because the country had shown its approval of the purchase; and secondly, because it was to be deprecated that foreign countries should think there was a division of opinion in Parliament as to the policy which had dictated the purchase of the shares.

MR. NORWOOD said, the point of the debate which interested the commercial community of which he was the Representative, had reference to the influence which the Government might or might not acquire in the protection of British interests by the purchase of the Canal shares, and with regard to it he had not heard any sufficient answer or explanation. It was true that the Prime Minister, on the first night of the Session, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer more recently still, had instanced the importance of the purchase in that sense, when speaking of the action which the English Government was called upon to take with regard to the Canal in 1872. Now he, acting on the part of his constituency, as one of those who were on that occasion engaged in laying the views of the shipowners before the Foreign Office, had a perfect recollection of what then occurred, and he might be allowed to observe that when M. de Lesseps at the time challenged the tonnage on which the dues had been previously paid, and maintained the right of the Company to make changes materially affecting British shipping, the Foreign Office, urged by the shipowners, applied not to the Khedive, but directly to Constantinople, and called upon the Porte to give an authoritative explanation as to the meaning of the concession which had been given. The result of that application was that an international Conference was held at Constantinople, at which the proposals of M. de Lesseps were discussed, and the decision was in favour of the Maritime Powers, among whom we took the lead, as against M. de Lesseps on the part of the Company. The Khedive, he might add, marched a considerable force of men to carry into effect the decision then arrived at; nor was it of his own motion, but in consequence of direct orders from Constantinople that he took that step. Well, that being so, what was our position now that those Canal shares had been purchased by the Government? Had we greater power than before to interfere on behalf of British mercantile interests as regarded concessions with regard to rates? For his own part he was rather disposed to think that the reverse would be the case. Hitherto when any complication or difficulty arose, our Government having no personal interest in the Canal were able to interfere on international grounds with effect, and to carry their point. But now we should be placed in a position of having a pecuniary interest in the Canal, although that interest was not immediate, for 19 years must elapse before we came into full possession of the shares which had been purchased. That being so, any attempt which we might make to improve the Canal, or to reduce the dues, would be met with the unanswerable argument that it was all very well for us to urge on expenditure which might benefit us 19 years hence, leaving the present shareholders to bear all the loss in the meantime. He must, therefore, maintain that the Government would be now less eager than ever to take up the cudgels on behalf of the mercantile interests. There were two important points, it appeared to him, upon which great doubt rested—the first was the rights to which we should be entitled by the purchase of these shares; the second was to what extent we should be called upon to contribute to future expenditure for the improvement of the Canal. On both points the partnership interest appeared to him to be very unsatisfactory, and he must remark that the maritime and mercantile community had not called upon the Government to interfere. There must be a large outlay to improve the Canal, and upon works requisite to its efficiency. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, indeed, appeared to be confident that no large outlay would be required in connection with the Canal, but there were, he (Mr. Norwood) believed, great engineering difficulties anticipated with respect to the Port Said mouth, which had been described as a harbour against nature. The entrance to that harbour had a decided tendency to silt up, and it would require the outlay of a large sum to keep it open. Then we ought to divest our minds of the idea that the outlay would be confined to the £4,000,000 we were now about to pay. His belief was that, before very long, we should be called upon to contribute a considerable sum of money out of the British Exchequer to keep the Canal in order. If a large vessel were sunk, either maliciously or accidentally, in the Canal, it might close the traffic for many weeks. The Sovereign Powers in regard to the Canal would, under any circumstances, be the Khedive and the Sultan, and those persons who talked about the purchase of the shares insuring the passage to our Indian possessions ought to bear in mind that without the consent of those Sovereigns, we could never convey armed ships or troops through the Canal, not even, if he were correctly informed, in time of peace. The concessions hitherto made by both applied only to merchant ships in time of peace. There was no right to demand a passage for a man-of-war, and this would certainly be a danger in time of war. If there happened to be a European war, Englishmen would never send their ships and their produce through the Canal; for to enable the Government to protect them it would be necessary that they should have perfect command of the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, and of the Canal. In speaking of the importance of the Canal, hon. Members had left out of sight the fact that the overland traffic for passengers by rail from Alexandria to Suez existed, and that the route to India by way of the Cape was always open to us. To assert, therefore, that we were really dependent on the Suez Canal for our communication with India was a very considerable exaggeration. The distance to Calcutta was only 3,500 miles further round the Cape than it was through the Canal, and the difference of time in conveying troops to India by full-powered steamers would only be 14 or 15 days. As to the alleged importance of the Canal with reference to our Australian Colonies, he need only remark that no steamers went through the Canal to Australia, while sailing vessels, he believed, never used the Canal at all. In his judgment the importance of the purchase had been very much overrated. Reference had been made to the policy of Lord Palmerston in opposing the Canal, but, although that statesman was undoubtedly wrong in professing that the Canal could not be made, yet he was right in his estimate that it would be injurious to English commerce, or rather that it would be of considerably greater advantage to foreign than to British commerce. Formerly, the commerce of India and China came to this country, which supplied other nations but that state of things was altered now. The route by the Canal had thrown open speedy communication with the great Mediterranean ports, and the result was that a vast amount of produce which was formerly brought in British bottoms to our ports, and was then re-shipped to Continental markets, was now carried direct to Odessa, Trieste, Genoa, and Marseilles, to the detriment of the shipping and mercantile interests of this country. The purchase of the shares would, he feared, involve us in many complications; it would lead to great international questions being raised, and it would fail to advance one iota the commercial interests of this country.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he wished to direct a few remarks to the position of the Government and the country as holders of shares in a foreign company. The subject was a dry one, no doubt, but it was certainly one of importance in the consideration of the case. On the one hand there was an Egyptian Company, as appeared by the terms of the Concession and the Statutes, and accordingly it was governed by the laws and usages of Egypt. In this Egyptian Company the British Government had certificates of a large number of shares, and the question was as to the rights we were entitled to as holders of those shares. It was true we had no right, as we had no desire, to interfere in the affairs of Egypt; but there could be no doubt that the possession of the shares gave us a right to advise the Khedive on all matters affecting directly the interests of the Canal, and likewise on questions which might arise between Egypt and foreign Governments in reference to the Canal. One point on which we might advantageously advise the Khedive would be as to the appointment of a new Director of the Canal when M. de Lesseps' term of office expired. It was clear that the rights of the British Government were not confined to the receipt of dividends, and he might here point out that Article 20 of the Statutes had hardly been referred to sufficiently for the purpose of showing what were our rights and obligations. Among the rights was clearly the right to vote. He did not know whether the counsel for the Company adhered strongly to their opinion, but when they were informed of the contrary opinion given by the counsel for the Khedive, they agreed to the compromise that the Khedive should temporarily have a right to vote. This fact appeared at Page 43 of the Papers presented to the House, and therefore the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London must have been perfectly well aware of it. There could be no doubt that the British Government had only a right to 10 votes, but he could see nothing in the Statutes and Concessions which would prevent the Government in a great crisis from distributing these shares, and thus securing, he would not say an overwhelming, but a certain large proportion of votes. He did not, however, wish to press this course, which, politically, would be a wrong course to take. He should prefer to see two or three persons of known ability and judgment, like Colonel Stokes, qualified by the possession of shares, to represent the British Government at the general meetings or upon the Council. He should also prefer that they should not vote, but that it should be understood that their opinions and advice were sanctioned and supported by the British Government. In this way we should gain more direct and legitimate influence than by the creation of new votes. In another way we could exercise considerable influence. In the event of new Statutes being made, the assent of the Khedive had to be obtained before they could be carried into execution. Now, the British Government might fail in the attempt to get their views adopted at the general meetings, but it would be a legitimate exercise of our influence to press our views upon the Khedive in the case he had supposed. As to the liability upon the shares, it was limited by the amount of share capital, and all the shares were fully paid up. He saw no objection to the arbitration provided under the Concession and the Statutes, with an appeal to the Superior Court of Paris, or that it was a tribunal with which this country could find fault. It appeared to him that this transaction left our relations with foreign States unaltered. In the event of any change in the tonnage dues injurious to the interests of any foreign State, its remedy would be against the Company; and if remonstrances were made to the Khedive or the Porte, the political situation, as far as our Representatives were concerned, would be precisely the same as now. He confessed, however, he should be glad to see that, in accordance with the views of the Board of Trade in the case of the Mouths of the Danube, which were placed under an International Commission—the influence gained by this country might be exerted to bring about a similar state of things with regard to the Suez Canal, and he hailed the step taken by the Government as a step towards that end. No doubt the step was a novel one, and might give rise to some difficulties and complications; but he rejoiced that the Government were not deterred either by the novelty of the position or by the fear of complications from taking a course which had not been suggested by a selfish desire to promote the interests or the commerce of this country, but with the view to keep open the great line of communication between England, India, and the Australian Colonies, and in the interests of the world at large—a course which, he believed, the country had distinctly affirmed, and which he trusted the House would sanction.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that in 1858 he asked the House to deprecate any influence being used on the part of England which would put any stop to the formation of the Suez Canal. M. de Lesseps, with great courage and daring, and with great genius, brought forward a scheme to carry a canal through the Isthmus, thereby rendering mankind better able to communicate between one part of the globe and the other. At that time Lord Palmerston had great power; and, unhappily for England, that noble Lord had two remarkable crazes. If you mentioned the name of the Empire of Brazil before him, it was like putting a red rag before a mad bull. He got up in a moment, and fiercely attacked the Member who ventured to mention the subject in favourable terms, and did all he could to disparage the subject. So with the Suez Canal. He possessed himself with the delusion—for he had many of the prejudices and narrow-mindedness of Englishmen—that the Suez Canal would—God knew why—damage the commerce and interests of England. The House of Commons at that time coincided with Lord Palmerston. Among the small minority who voted with him (Mr. Roebuck) on the occasion to which he had just alluded was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and among those who formed the great majority that voted against him was the present Prime Minister. But such, however, was the whirligig of time that now he found himself supporting the conduct of the Prime Minister with respect to the Suez Canal, and opposed to all the argumentation—such as it was—of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. It appeared to him at the time of which he was speaking, and he thought experience had proved him to have been correct, that English commerce would, of all the commerce in the world, be most benefited by the construction of the Canal. As a matter of fact, he believed that of the vessels that passed through the Canal 75 per cent were English. They were told that other nations took advantage of the Canal to convey the products of various parts of the world to their own countries, and that thus the commercial interests of England were injured. This, it appeared to him, was to take a very narrow view of the commerce of the world and of the question in what consisted the advantages of commerce. Could it do any harm to England if Italy spent a portion of her capital in buying the produce of our Indian Empire or of China, and then took it home to Italy by way of the Suez Canal? It might be said that the goods might have been bought with English capital, but it was a fact that English capital was at present fully employed, and he could see nothing in the argument to which he had alluded to show any reason why Italian capital should not also be employed in the same line of business. He had been astonished, and more than astonished on that occasion by the class and manner of the argumentation which had been used in the speeches delivered on the question from the front Opposition bench. He thought he was coming down to hear great statesmen talk upon a great question of statesmanship, and that he was about to hear men of great knowledge, experience, and power point out how this purchase was likely to prove of great advantage or injury to England; but when he listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, he thought that he was listening to the speech of an Old Bailey lawyer, raising on a great question of finance small points as to interest and capital. Further, when the great interests of England were concerned, he was told that upon this question of £4,000,000 the Canal might have been bought for less. This was the manner in which a great question was handled. Suppose England had paid rather more, perhaps, than any other purchaser would have paid; and supposing that for the next 19 years they had no interest in the Canal, he would ask what were 19 years in the history of a people? They had bought something which would last for 99 or 100 years, and though 19 of those years might not be so advantageous as the other part of the 100, it appeared to him that they had still bought a most important property, and it was not consistent either with dignity or the interest of England to haggle about the price that had been paid for it. It must be remembered that this was a remarkable incident. Parliament was not on the present occasion dealing with an ordinary case. The question on the part of the Khedive was—"Will you buy? I cannot give you time; I want the money and I want it at once." The Government were told they ought not to have entered upon the transaction without the sanction of Parliament; but he, on the other hand, gave very great praise to the Government, for they, having confidence in Parliament, had the sagacity to discover the real interest of England and the courage to act up to it. They took advantage of the occasion, and did not take advantage of the necessities of the Khedive to drive a hard bargain with him. They acted as the great Representatives of a great people in giving the Khedive a fair price for his property—a price that had been offered before—and then adopting the most advantageous means of obtaining the money. He was told that this was unconstitutional. Perhaps it might—though the word conveyed very little meaning to him—be unconstitutional for the Prime Minister of England, having confidence in his cause, believing that the House of Commons would agree with him, and finding a sagacious merchant in the City of London believing in him, and ready to employ four millions of money in the purchase, to have gone on with the transaction; but to his mind the Prime Minister who would have taken any other course would have been a coward and unfit for the position which he held. He therefore wished to look for a moment at what had been done, why it was done, and to ask what would have been the result if it had not been done? What was done was, that the Khedive having wisely or unwisely brought himself into financial difficulty wanted money at once. He had in his hands a great security which it was for the advantage of the world that it should continue as it was. He brought this security upon the market, and the question was, whether the English Government should take advantage of the opportunity afforded to them, and by buying the property establish themselves as partners in a great concern, or whether they should leave it alone. The Government decided the question in the affirmative, but Parliament had been told that they gained no interest by so doing. He could not believe that the man who used that argument believed it. What had happened even that day? Could it be contended that the interest and power of England in Egypt had not already been increased by the bargain which had been made? Let them, however, go one step further and ask what great complications were now darkening the political horizon of the world. Did anybody believe that Turkey or Egypt would remain what they were? Would it not have been matter of great lamentation for England to find that Turkey had broken down; that Egypt had lost a great portion of her power, and that there existed a cabal sufficiently strong to close the Canal against the passage of English ships. Therefore he said that the Government took advantage of a great opportunity. When he was told that only 13 or 14 days were saved in a voyage to India by means of the Canal, he could only suppose that a man making such a statement possessed very little commercial knowledge. Thirteen or fourteen days involved a turn in the market, and this in its turn meant a great deal to commercial men. They knew that attempts had been made to run clippers to Australia and America, and that danger to life and property had been incurred in the endeavour to shorten the journey to America by a single day. Was he to be told then that English merchants were wrong in endeavouring to save a single day between this country and America, and that a difference of a fortnight, more or less, in a journey from this country to India was a matter of no importance? If Her Majesty's Government had not taken advantage of the opportunity afforded to them, the Khedive would have sold his shares not to one person or Government, but to many thousands of purchasers, and the difficulty with which England would have had to contend would have increased a hundred-fold. They would not have been able to trust for a month or six weeks upon what might happen, and British commerce would have been hindered, frittered away, and hampered by such a state of things. English commerce would have been driven again to take the old course round the Cape of Good Hope, instead of the new one, which had rendered so much more easy and certain the conveyance of British commerce to India. Looking at the question in a broad light, and speaking of it in these few words, he held himself justified in saying—for he was of no party, and never had been—that in his belief, and in the belief of the country, Her Majesty's Government, dealing with the question as Englishmen and Ministers ought to have done, had taken a step which, whatever their future course might be, and for however long or short a period their tenure of office might continue, would always cause the world to recollect the name of him who was at the head of the Government when this purchase was initiated and carried through Parliament.

Mr. LEVESON-GOWER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Roebuck) assumed that in consequence of the step which the Government had taken, England had virtually got possession of the Canal—a statement which he (Mr. Leveson-Gower) completely denied. As a matter of fact, England had no rights of property in the Canal. All she had bought was a right to share in the earnings of the Canal 19 years hence, without any share at all in the control of the undertaking. This was all, with regard to which the hon. and learned Gentleman said it was a miserable proceeding to object to the price which had to be paid. For himself, he could only say that if the purchase were attended with all the advantages claimed for it, he for one would not haggle about price, nor would he even blame the Government if they gave for the shares even more than they were worth. But in his opinion, when a large sum of money like this was spent it was the duty of the House of Commons to inquire a little into what that expenditure had been. This was not merely a question of pounds, shillings, and pence; there was a principle lying above it. The Government, as had been well said, had engaged in two transaction. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer sought to show that the two transactions were really one, when he said that when a boy bought a knife he bought the blade and the handle, and that the two formed the knife. That was true, but the two transactions in which the Government had engaged were perfectly distinct. They had bought shares and they had bought an annuity from the Khedive, and they might have done either without doing the other. Again, the right hon. Gentleman had said, that the property was purchased below its value. Was that so? It was stated that the French Company had offered the Khedive close on £4,000,000 for the shares, but he had seen it declared in a French journal that the sum was £3,500,000. But the value of the shares which were upon the open market was easily ascertainable. At the price of the day when they were purchased, £28 a-share, was £4,928,000; but from that sum must be deducted the value of the coupons (£2,880,000), which would leave the shares to be worth a little over £2,000,000. It came then to this, that we had made a loan to Egypt at about 7 per cent. No doubt the Khedive deserved well at the hands of England. He had given largely, not perhaps wisely, but certainly generously, towards the formation of a Canal from which England derived great benefit. It was very desirable that good relations should continue to exist between this country and Egypt; but he feared the relationship of debtor and creditor was not calculated to maintain a good and friendly feeling. Then on the subject of the control we obtained by the purchase, he could only say that he did not think it was at all desirable that the Government of England should become a member of a company of private individuals, or become liable to be summoned before a tribunal of law at the instance of foreigners. But as to control, we had none—for 10 votes were no more valuable than no vote at all would be. Control was the only excuse that could be offered for the step taken by the Government, and that excuse failed the Government; for as they had stated that evening, they were aware of the fact when they concluded the transaction. He did not regard the question in a Party spirit, and should rejoice if the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government should tend to the advantage of the country.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he desired to say a few words on this subject, as it was one in which the administrative and commercial interests of India were deeply concerned. He regretted to hear the speech which had been delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). It was a speech of a peculiar character, and reminded him of the financial policy of the right hon. Gentleman, which was penny wise and pound foolish. The right hon. Gentleman enlarged upon the cost of every penny to be expended, but deliberately ignored every pound that was to be gained. He had, however, no fault to find with the concluding sentences of the right hon. Gentleman. He made grave charges against Her Majesty's Government. They were incredibly ignorant—they were unaccountably careless. The right hon. Gentleman, however, did not adduce any evidence in support of those charges, and candidly stated that if he had not substantiated the charges he made—which he had not—then he withdrew them. But the right hon. Gentleman who followed him made a speech of a very different character, but there seemed to him to be this fallacy underlying the whole of his speech—he argued it as an abstract question. Now, the question before the House was not an abstract question. It was this—were the Government justified in buying the Khedive's shares, when, if they did not do so, a French Company would? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, in moving the Adjournment on a former night, had given as a reason that he was anxious to read the Papers carefully. He had, however—of course, unintentionally—based his argument to-night on a mis-statement which the Papers conclusively disproved. Those Papers showed that the most serious complications had arisen between those who owned and those who used the Canal, and they set forth the origin of those complications and pointed to the remedies. The right hon. Gentleman asserted that the condition of affairs previous to the purchase was not a bad state of affairs. The Board of Trade, however, pointed out that the complications and differences would be endless as long as the Canal remained in the hands of a private company, and that the remedy was to impart a national character to the undertaking. The Duke of Argyll had also remarked upon the fact that it would be an advantage to British interests to have the Suez Canal in the hands of England rather than of France. Had not something of a national character been imparted to the Canal by the purchase by the British Government of an interest which would otherwise have fallen into the hands of French bankers and merchants? The hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Leveson-Gower) had ignored two or three considerations. When the purchase was proposed, the first question that arose was what advantage we should derive from the purchase, and, if we had to borrow money, at what rate we should borrow it? The answer to these questions showed that the Canal was more valuable to us than to anyone else, and that we could borrow money cheaper than anyone else. If the French Company could have borrowed an unlimited sum at 4 per cent the House might be very confident that the Government would not have got these shares. Would anyone tell him what the value of our coupons would be 19 years hence? They were £20 shares, and they now stood at a premium of £8. What made them now worth £28? Because they were entitled to a dividend they never had earned before. Mr. Reilly had stated in the Papers the primary charges on the revenues of the Canal, which were the interest on the sinking fund and the loans, and then 5 per cent upon the capital. After that the whole of the proceeds were to be divided as follows:—The Khedive was to be entitled to 15 per cent; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was very anxious to know why the Government did not buy those shares. The promoters were entitled to 10 per cent; then came 2 per cent for administration, and there remained for the shareholders 71 per cent. The Government held 44 per cent of the total shares in the Company, and our proportion of the dividend would, therefore, be upwards of 31 per cent 19 years hence. And yet the right hon. Gentleman asked why the Government had not taken shares which were only entitled to 15 per cent, and which would be of no value until 10 years hence? Now, what was the price of these shares at 10 per cent? The promoters' shares were 1,000 in number, and each of them stood at present at the price of £567. Therefore, the promoters' shares in the aggregate were worth £567,000, while the value of our dividend as it stood was £1,700,000. Although he would not indulge in the spirit of prophecy, yet if the earth retained its present shape, and if the Suez Canal continued to be the means of communication between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, the value of our dividend alone, apart from the interest upon our shares, would be worth more, 19 years hence, than the £4,000,000 we had given for it. If the revenue only increased 2½ per cent, that would be the result; and the Government had not, therefore, in his opinion, made a bad bargain. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich apprehended that Egypt would not pay the 5 per cent. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the Khedive was unable to pay, and if a French Company had bought the Canal it was clear that he would not be able to pay the 10 per cent, what would our position then be? The whole of the shares would be in the hands of France, and complications between those who used and those who controlled the Canal would again ensue. Those differences would have to be settled by the intervention of the Khedive or the Sultan. The Sultan might have other business on hand, and the Khedive would be in the hands of his French creditors, and to whom should we then look? The Government had been asked whether this purchase had anything to do with the Eastern Question. It seemed to him that it had satisfactorily settled what might be a very serious Western question. The relations between England and France had never been more amicable than at the present moment; but if the whole of the shares of the Canal had been in the hands of the French, while the persons who used the Canal were mainly English, what would have been the result? It had been stated in the Papers laid upon the Table that the British Government would take its stand on the interests of its navigation, which contributed the great proportion of the shipping, while the French Government, on the other hand, could not be indifferent to the interests of the French shareholders. Any such complications which would probably have arisen had been averted by the action of Her Majesty's Government. When the Members of the present Government were in Opposition, they were frequently told that they ought to be guided by public opinion. Now, if ever there was a question on which public opinion was unanimous, it was the present. The people of these Islands were practically unanimous. Foreign nations did not object; and the people of India, so far as he knew, were equally in favour of the purchase. M. de Lesseps was also favourable to it, and no one opposed it except certain right hon. Gentlemen on the front Opposition bench. Although some of their criticisms were fair, yet there was a latent hostility underlying those criticisms which would very soon develop into open attack if these right hon. Gentlemen could get any support from the hon. Members behind them. He felt bound to say that the Liberal Party had evidently come to a conclusion on this matter in accordance with what the right hon. Gentleman described as "the inflammatory approval of the metropolitan Press." With regard to the advantages of the Suez Canal to our trade with India, he had been surprised to hear the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) assert that the time gained was only 14 or 15 days. [Mr. Norwood: I spoke of a steamer.] He (Lord George Hamilton) was under the impression that the difference was between four and ten weeks; and that was, he believed, the opinion of the great majority of persons. [Mr. Norwood: The distance is 3,500 miles.] He could not better illustrate the importance of the Suez Canal to India than by stating that a Bombay merchant recently sent home a large quantity of raw cotton through the Canal. This cotton was manufactured into cloth and returned 70 days after it had left Bombay. If the Suez Canal were closed it would cause a strain on our Indian finances which it would be very difficult to meet. One point had not been noticed, and it was that at least this transaction did not furnish another illustration of the alleged tendency on the part of the English Government to relieve the English Estimates at the expense of the Indian Revenue. If there was a charge to which the Indian Revenue might have been called upon to contribute, it was the purchase of these shares; and if any such request had been made, it would have been cheerfully acquiesced in; but the Government acted in a wiser spirit, and proposed to place no portion of this charge upon the Revenue of India. The purchase told the world that if in the past we had ignored the advantages of the Canal, we had amply condoned for our error, and by this judicious investment in an enterprise which French skill and energy alone had made successful, we had formed a happy combination which would do much towards securing a free and uninterrupted water way between this country and India.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would say very little as regarded the Canal shares pure and simple. A great deal might be said for and against the purchase; but the thing had been done, the nation had accepted it, and they could not go back. In fact, he for one should be sorry to put any difficulty in the way. But there was another view which had not been touched upon. He observed that when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke to-night he touched with extreme reserve upon the question as to how they were to get the £200,000. On a former occasion he said he was coming to that subject, but he never did so, and that evening he had only touched very lightly upon it. Even should it be a loss to us, he (Sir George Campbell) should not consider it a fatal argument against the bargain. If the Government had told them the money was paid, and they might or might not get the £200,000, he should not now put in his word. But the point to which he wished to draw attention was this—that that was the course which the Government had not chosen to take. They had preferred to ostentatiously make this matter a separate account, and they made their credit dependent upon the realization of the money from the Khedive, so that they had identified themselves with the credit of the Khedive, and if that failed they would be discredited. Allusion had been made to the Report of Mr. Cave, who had emitted certain platitudes, but they afforded no solution as to where we were to get the £200,000 from. If the Khedive reformed his financial administration, then it was believed he might meet all his engagements; but he (Sir George Campbell) confessed that this was a subject with regard to which he had the greatest doubt. He not only doubted that it was possible for an extreme financial reform like this to be achieved at once, but he doubted whether the matter had not gone so far already that the credit of the Khedive could not be saved by any reform at all. Let them look at the matter as one of account. Mr. Cave was no doubt a very able and respectable Gentleman, but he had no special knowledge of Oriental finance which would enable him to tell them with confidence that the Khedive was in a position to set his finances right. Now, according to an authoritative statement which had been put forth and never contradicted, the revenue account of the Khedive amounted to £10,542,000, of which £6,300,000 was set apart for the interest of the Debt, and £688,000 for the tribute to the Sultan. These sums, amounting to £7,032,000, left £3,510,000. But of this £3,510,000, two-thirds was not revenue, but land revenue which had been capitalized, and in respect of which the payments would cease in six years from their commencement. This deduction left but £1,149,000, which could not be sufficient for the ordinary administration of the country. As to the sinking fund which had been talked of, it was notorious that the Debt was increased faster than it was reduced. Now, if India was to do a thing of that kind, they would not say she was in a very solvent condition; in fact, they would say that she was verging on bankruptcy. He knew something of Oriental finance, and he must say he totally disbelieved in a very rapid increase in the revenues of Egypt. On the contrary, he thought those revenues had been stretched to the utmost, and they were enormous for such a country. No doubt very great works had been carried out principally in Said Pacha's time before these debts were incurred, and Egypt had largely benefited by the cotton famine, the same as India did; but these resources had been made the most of, and he did not believe that they could be carried further. Some taxes were now being kept up in Egypt which had long since been abandoned in India. The serious view of this matter was that the Government having identified themselves with the credit of the Khedive, he would be bound to raise the revenue to meet his engagements, and the result of that would be that a terribly-increased pressure would be brought to bear against the already unhappy ryots of Egypt. It was already stated that the Khedive had devised a new tax—the poll tax. If that was true, he could only look upon it as the beginning of the end, for in the East a poll tax had never been added to a land tax, and he did not think both could be raised in Egypt. Let us take our chance, but not allow ourselves to become a cause of oppression, and a source of stock-jobbing and intrigue. He had rejoiced to hear the First Lord of the Treasury declare that the purchase was not with a view to war, but some hints seemed to point to the possibility of war. The right hon. Gentleman said we were a great Mediterranean Power, and a great Asiatic Power, maintaining a chain of fortresses from England to India. The distance between the two countries was upwards of 6,000 miles, and as the fortresses were only three—Gibraltar, Malta, and Aden—the average distance between them was 2,000 miles. That was rather a loose kind of chain. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to hint that the Canal might become another link; but it was very doubtful whether in case of war we could carry on our commerce by the aid of such a chain of fortresses through the Mediterranean.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, that at the beginning of last Session he ventured to state his apprehension that foreign affairs were depicted in Her Majesty's gracious Speech with a somewhat too rose-coloured a pencil—that though the different Governments might, and with truth, express their good feeling towards us, still, that among themselves, the relations of the Continental Powers were by no means of so assuring and placid a character. When he thus gave expression to his misgivings, he little thought that so short a time would so amply confirm them. Scarce a twelve-month had passed away, and how did Europe stand now? Why, upon the magazine of a charged mine, which might be fired at any moment by the passion or caprice of one or two tribes of semi-barbarous mountaineers; and they might be assured that, when this mine did explode, it would topple over one, if not two, of the most extensive Empires in the commonwealth of nations. It was in view of such a catastrophe that he hailed with joy the bold and sagacious action taken by Her Majesty's Ministers in the matter of the Suez Canal. He hailed this action of the Government not so much on account of any commercial advantages—though they were beyond price—but because it announced to the world that we would not allow the affairs of the East to be arranged to our detriment—that we would not suffer the portals of Asia to be closed against us, and last, but greatest, that no European military Power should post itself between us and the mighty dominions, both foreign and English, which we held in India and Australasia. He felt confident that Englishmen of all classes would rejoice that the Conservative Government, which two years ago was returned by acclamation to supersede a Cabinet as timorous in its foreign policy as it was aggressive and dangerous amongst ourselves and our valued institutions, was taking an attitude in foreign affairs which would make the honour and influence of England felt throughout the civilized world. It was for these reasons that the people of England received the intelligence of what had been done with unanimous approval—the hon. Gentlemen the Members for Hackney excepted—and the manner of effecting it had been worthy of the measure itself. We had given no just cause of offence to anyone. We had no sinister motives. Our possessions were abundant, and we coveted no man's gold, silver, or lands; and with our goodwill there should be no war. Nevertheless, the times looked ominous, and an anecdote occurred to him regarding this very land of Egypt, which might not be without its significance. At Ashraf, Kait Bey, the famous Circassian Sultan of the Mamelukes, when told that Tamerlane—who had just overthrown the Ottoman Turks and taken the Sultan Bazeid prisoner, intended to invade Egypt, said—"I don't care two aspers for the Kipchach cripple; let him come and entangle his hordes amongst the branches and canal of the Nile, and I and my Mamelukes will soon give a good account of them. I don't fear him, but I will tell you whom I do fear. It is those who will come by sea, and bring a heavy artillery with them." This hint might not be without its use in the proximate future of that country.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY said, he held that the policy of purchasing these shares was one question, and the way in which the money was obtained for that purchase was another. He did not think the attention of the Committee had been sufficiently directed to the latter point, and on that he wished to say a few words. With reference to the purchase of the shares it was impossible to get up any real debate. The country itself had never debated the question—it was a matter of feeling, not of judgment. He did not suppose that many of the newspapers had ever considered into what complications we might eventually be thrown in consequence of this purchase. Even the warning voice of the late Prime Minister had failed to produce its usual effect in warning the House. The mode in which the money had been provided for meeting this purchase was, he thought, discreditable to the country. If the Government required to raise £1,000,000—and that was all that was required in the first instance—they ought to have taken the Governor, Deputy Governor, and Directors of the Bank of England into council, and, instead of paying 2½ per cent commission, there would have been no difficulty in obtaining the sum from the Bank of England and the other banks of London, without any commission whatever. At that very time money was lent to the Bank of England by Joint Stock Banks for 1½ per cent, and that the word commission should be mentioned at all in these days in connection with the financial transactions of the nation was in the highest degree distasteful and humiliating. There would have been ample time between the payment of £1,000,000 and the necessity for providing the remainder of the money to call Parliament together; and if Parliament had ratified the bargain, the other part of the money would have been granted in the regular Constitutional way. It would not redound to the reputation of England, when this question of the purchase of the Khedive's shares had lost some of the false glare which at present surrounded and obscured it, to find, as all would then admitted, that no necessity whatever existed for England having to raise money at the same rate as Egypt herself was compelled to pay for loans.

MR. LAING said, he did not approve the commission, not because of its amount, but because it was paid by the wrong party—the British Government, instead of the Khedive. Of course, the Government could have gone to the Bank of England and borrowed the money at 4 per cent, or thereabouts, without any commission; but the essence of this transaction was that there was a certain element of risk in it; the Government were not in a position to do it directly, and they probably ascertained that the Bank was not in a condition to advance the money. But his chief reason for rising now was that he was one of those who many years ago supported the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) when he endeavoured to show that the influence of England ought not to be exerted against the Suez Canal. He felt strongly now, as then, that the English Government never made a greater mistake than in opposing that great international improvement, in which, if completed, she was sure to have the largest share. He therefore heartily approved the action of the Government in purchasing those shares. He was anxious it should be felt that, notwithstanding some microscopic criticism, the country at large, and the Liberal Party in general, had not in the slightest degree altered the opinion at first entertained on the question, but deliberately approved of the measure. It was impossible to look at this as merely a little Vestry question—a question of purchasing the tolls over a bridge or at a toll-bar. It was impossible, also, to take an isolated view of the matter. When Her Majesty's Government joined in recommending Count Andrassy's Note to the Porte, that was a policy entirely different from the policy acted upon in former years. The financial difficulties of Turkey led to the financial crisis of Egypt, and that obliged the Khedive to hawk about his shares. A French Company was on the point of purchasing them, and Her Majesty's Government had to decide promptly on the line of policy it would adopt. The main reason why the people of this country hailed with such unanimous approval the first announcement of the purchase of the shares was because they saw in it a pledge that we had broken finally with our old policy on the Eastern Question, and that we recognized the fact that, in preserving our communication with India, our great and paramount interest lay in Egypt rather than in Turkey. It was breaking with that old and detestable policy which consisted in bolstering up that barbarous Power, Turkey, whether right or wrong, whether against foreign aggression or legitimate internal discontent. It was our old policy to secure a way across the Isthmus by influencing Turkey rather than Egypt. The country would hear with delight that we were no longer going to act upon the principle of supporting Turkey at all hazards, and that we had transferred the centre of gravity of our political action in the East from Constantinople to Cairo. The country had approved of the purchase, and was glad to find that under the present Government England was prepared to take her stand firmly and to rely upon herself in Eastern matters. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had sneered at the action of the Government as being a spirited policy that always met with the approbation of the Press which delighted in complications. [MR. GLADSTONE DISSENTED.] Well, if the right hon. Gentleman had not said so, somebody else had. He entirely approved the principle of non-intervention if it meant that England should not mix herself up in every petty diplomatic squabble that occurred on the Continent, and that she should not assert that she was in the right when she knew that she was in the wrong, and that she should not humiliate herself by interfering and preaching to foreign nations when she was not prepared to back her opinion by arms, as she had done in the cases of Poland and Denmark. The policy of non-intervention had been pushed to an extreme by those who had either an abhorrence of war or were in favour of a rigid economy in the finances, and had led foreign nations to believe that we intended to withdraw altogether from taking part in Continental affairs, because we were separated from the Continent by "the little silver streak." Such a view was contrary to the feeling of the nation, which was willing to back its real interests by arms and by treasure. The step, therefore, taken by the Government had been a timely one, inasmuch as it removed any such impression. At the same time, we had no selfish motive, but wished to make the Canal an international affair, open to all the world. All the criticism that had been exercised had failed to get rid of the great fact that by the possession of these shares the influence of England in regard to any complications that might arise on Eastern Questions would be very greatly strengthened. As to the power of voting, he agreed with what had been said, that in these matters shares were weighed, not counted. He had had a great deal of experience himself as a director of public companies, and he must say that the knowledge that such a large interest as nearly one-half of the whole shares was held by one party, would weigh, and ought to weigh, very materially in any decision the Board of Directors might come to on points of policy. It seemed to him that in any conference regarding the direction of the Canal, England would stand in a much better position than if other nations could say—"You opposed it as long as you could, and you have never moved a finger to help it." In an extreme case we might even split up the shares in order to get a larger voting power. He trusted some arrangement would be made for buying up the interests of the other shareholders at an equitable price, and making it an international concern. If the British Government had not taken the shares the French Company would have made an arrangement to distribute them in the French market, and if the shares had got into French hands the opportunity would have been lost, and in case of future complications the French Government would have had pressure put upon it to take up a position antagonistic to the English Government, which might have led to serious quarrels. He gave his warm and entire approval to the purchase of the shares; but there were some questions incidental to it which he could not so entirely approve. The purchase of the shares involved England in no responsibility beyond the risk of losing a few thousands a-year; but in regard to Mr. Cave's mission and the appointment of Mr. Rivers Wilson, it was very different. They were gentlemen of such eminence that it was difficult to avoid the conclusion that by sending them out to Egypt we were incurring a certain amount of moral responsibility in regard to Egyptian finance. If an adverse report was made, or if Mr. Rivers Wilson should not stay, the consequence must be most prejudicial to the credit of our ally. If, on the other hand, the reports were favourable, and Mr. Wilson stayed, could we avoid incurring a certain amount of responsibility towards parties who, on the strength of those circumstances, advanced money? That, however, was a matter which might be discussed hereafter. In regard to the purchase of the shares, he had no hesitation or misgiving, and for the step they had taken he tendered his cordial thanks to the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, it is evident from the tenour of the speeches which have been delivered on this side as well as on the other side that the Vote will be agreed to, and I see it is the wish of the Committee that the debate should terminate this evening. I am glad to believe there will be other opportunities upon which the question can be discussed, and I think that to-morrow, when the discussion of this evening is considered by hon. Members of the House, and is read throughout the country, there will be a very general feeling of satisfaction, that for the first time this act of the Government has been thoroughly discussed in all its bearings, and that the other side, as well as the side favourable to the action of the Government, has at last been placed before the country. It was probably hardly to be expected that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, following immediately such a speech as was delivered by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, could give that speech a complete answer; but I think that the House and the country will feel that my right hon. Friend has asked many questions which as yet have received no answer whatever, and which ought, before this question is finally disposed of, to receive full and categorical replies, and, if possible, answers. The right hon. Gentleman gave no answer to the questions which my right hon. Friend put to him upon such subjects as these—he gave him no answer as to the existence of any precedent for the employment of a private firm in such a transaction as this. He gave him no answer as to the amount of speculation which it was alleged had occurred in the Canal and in Egyptian stock before the public announcement of the transaction. He gave him no answer to the question which he raised as to the unnecessary and unreasonable amount, as he represented, of the commission to be paid to Messrs. Rothschild on this transaction. He gave him no answer with reference to the reason which induced the Government having eagerly bought these shares, without being entitled to dividends or to vote—he gave him no answer to the question as to the reason why the same Government positively, and at a moment's notice, refused the offer of the Khedive's 15 per cent shares. He gave him no answer to the question what were the probabilities and the grounds of expectation that they would receive 5 per cent guarantee from the Khedive. He gave no answer to the question why, for 19 years, there should be such a difference between the position of the Government and that of the other ordinary shareholders of the Canal. Finally, and most important of all, he gave no answer to the argument of my right hon. Friend, which was that we had exchanged a well-defined position—a position in which we stood at an advantage, and which had been proved to be a strong one—and had substituted for it a precarious position which could scarcely by any means be a stronger one than that which we had abandoned, and would, in all probability, prove to be a much weaker one. I have said that the vote we are about to come to will probably be a unanimous one. I am not going to enter into the discussion whether technically it is competent for us to repudiate the transaction of the Government or not. That is an interesting subject of discussion; but I conceive that were the objections to this measure ten times stronger than represented by hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the House, and were the advantages to be derived from it ten times more doubtful than they would seem to be, the House would not repudiate such a transaction as this, deliberately entered into by the Executive Government of the country, empowered as it is to pledge the credit of the country, and which has acted upon its responsibility. But I am quite willing to go further. I will admit that if the House were free—technically it is free, but practically it is not free at this moment—it would probably ratify, if not unanimously, at all events by a very large majority, the action of the Government. I am not able, perhaps, to appreciate so fully as hon. Gentlemen opposite the reasons which would induce the House to take that course; but I have always thought—and upon the first opportunity which I had of expressing my opinion on the subject in public said—that, looking at the matter from a political point of view, there was a great deal to be said in favour of the course which the Government had taken. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, in reply to me the other night, said he did not know that the Eastern Question had any connection with the subject, and he declined to reply to the question I put, whether the transaction had anything to do with it or not? But it seemed to me then, and seems to me still, that, looking at the state of things in Turkey at the time when the Government made that public declaration, it was an unmistakable declaration, stronger than could be made in any despatch, that, whatever might be decided by the Great Powers of Europe as to the future destiny of the Turkish dominions, Her Majesty's Government were aware of the great interest this country has in Egypt and in the security of our communications with our Indian possessions, and that they were not disposed to abandon those interests, but rather disposed to strengthen and consolidate them. I thought then, and still think, that a declaration such as that, made in deed and not in word, was not inopportune; and if the subsequent conduct of the Government had corresponded with their action, then a great deal might have been said in its favour. But the Government have since then done everything they could to weaken the effect of that action. The speeches and despatches of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as well as the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this House, have, every one of them, entirely ignored what may be called the political side of this question, and dwell almost entirely on the supposed advantages which are to be acquired in the management of the Canal itself, and the disadvantages which it is supposed we are avoiding by the step that has been taken. I do not think it is now open to the Government to say, as was said the other day, that Lord Derby, when speaking at Edinburgh, gave only some of the reasons which have induced the Government to enter into this transaction, because we have on this point the authority of Lord Derby, as to what was meant, not only in his speech at Edinburgh, but in his despatch to Lord Lyons. Lord Lyons was therein instructed to acquaint the French Government that the desire of Her Majesty's Government was that the Khedive should keep his shares. That view has been repeated since, and, if so, it could not have been the desire of the Government to buy the shares; and, therefore, they still represent the proceeding as one that was forced upon them by necessity, and not one that they adopted from any deliberate conviction of its political expediency. Every declaration of that kind, in my opinion, weakens the political significance of the transaction—the aspect of it to which, as I have said, the greatest importance ought to be attached. The right hon. Gentleman declined the other night to discuss what would be the position of the Suez Canal in time of war—that is to say, he declined to take Parliament into his confidence on the subject. Yet I cannot but conceive that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues have formed their opinion of what would happen in the eventuality which I have indicated. This is one of those questions which, sooner or later, must be discussed. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks there are any English interests that would suffer from its premature discussion at this moment, I certainly would not seek to induce the Government to discuss it prematurely; but I cannot imagine that every Government and every statesman in Europe has not fully considered what position this Canal would occupy in time of war, and what would be the duty of the Sultan and the Khedive in regard to its neutrality. I cannot think, therefore, that a full and frank exposition to the House of the views of the Government on this subject could possibly give any impression to any foreign Government which would be prejudicial to the interests of this country. Although the right hon. Gentleman refused to discuss what would be done in time of war, he did not disdain to hint, as has already been referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) that we were in possession of a chain of fortresses between England and Bombay; and he led it to be supposed that by the acquisition of the Suez Canal he would in some way add another link to that chain. But I do not think it can be too soon or too clearly understood by the country that the possession of these shares, as far as explained by the Government, and as far as it is possible at present to see, gives us no advantage whatever in time of war; and, whatever may be the use made of the Canal, or whatever its position in time of peace, in time of war the Company will have nothing whatever to say to that use or to that position, which is a question to be entirely decided either by the relative strength of the belligerents, or by the action of the Sultan or of the Sovereign of Egypt. We are in possession now, I presume, at least of the views of the Government as to the advantages of the purchase in time of peace. We have been told much of the difficulties which have arisen between ourselves and the Company, and which have only been overcome by the interposition of the Khedive, and we have been led to believe that that interposition of the Khedive was prompted by his position as a shareholder. Now, I cannot find in these Papers any warrant or authority whatever for the statement. The Khedive, if he was interested as a shareholder, was interested in the same way and on the same side as M. de Lesseps and the other shareholders. He did not interfere as a shareholder, he interfered at the direction of the Sultan, at the instigation of other Powers, as Sovereign; and his position as Sovereign is—as Lord Derby has pointed out—not in the slightest degree affected by the sale of his shares. In his despatch to Major General Stanton, dated December 6, 1875, Lord Derby wrote thus—

“ You will, moreover, explain that Her Majesty's Government would regard as a violation of the Firman of the Porte, and as inconsistent with the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, any act of the Khedive dispossessing himself in any manner of the control over the Suez Canal which has been secured to his Highness by the Company's concessions and statutes, and which has been confirmed by the Porte.”

Therefore, on the 6th of December the view of the Government was that the territorial sovereignty over the Canal remained in the hands of the Khedive exactly in the same manner and degree as when he was a shareholder. The Government have failed, as I humbly think, to show that by the purchase of these shares they have added in any way whatever to the security which we possessed before in the possible intervention of the Sultan and the Khedive. It is perfectly clear that the position we occupy now is, in fact, rather weaker than it was before. As the greatest commercial State making use of the Canal, we had before a right to appeal to the Sultan and the Khedive for the strict enforcement of the engagements of the Company. But now, by entering as shareholders into the Company we have taken up a different position. We have accepted, as we are told, a representation of three members on the Governing Body of the Canal. Therefore, we are going to attempt in some way or other to influence the decisions of the Company from the inside, instead of the outside, as hitherto. Supposing our attempt be unsuccessful, as it may and probably will be, I ask the House whether we shall be in a stronger position to appeal to the Khedive or the Sultan to require the Company to fulfil its obligations? An analogous case is familiar to hon. Members. A Committee of this House discussing a Private Bill pays every attention to the representatives of private parties whose interests may be concerned; but I believe no account is ever taken by Committees of the representatives of a minority of shareholders who complain of the decision of the majority. The Government have, to a certain extent, placed us in the position of a minority of shareholders, whose views will be overruled by the Governing Body of the Company, and we have so far weakened our position as independent parties appealing for the due observance of the Company's engagements. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has laid great stress on the dangers which we have avoided by preventing these shares from falling into the hands of others. Other hon. Gentlemen on the same side of the House have also taken up the same view; but I do not see that we have run any such great risk as appears to weigh on the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. Had the shares fallen into the hands of some body or some individuals independent of French influence—that is to say, the influence of M. de Lesseps—that certainly would not have been prejudicial to our interests. The very worst case that could have occurred was that the shares should have fallen into the hands of French proprietors, who would have thrown in their influence with M. de Lesseps. But even that does not appear to me to be so alarming a contingency as it does to Her Majesty's Government. M. de Lesseps is at this moment predominant in the management of the Canal, and so long as he holds the influence he at present wields, and possesses the confidence of the shareholders, a few votes less or more for M. de Lesseps under these circumstances appears to me a matter of very little consequence. Let us consider now for a moment the dictum that as the holders of two-fifths of the shares of the Company, we must necessarily have a corresponding influence in its management. I admit that in ordinary enterprizes a shareholder with only the same vote as other shareholders may, nevertheless, have a greater moral and indirect influence than they when he has large interests which agree with theirs. But I can easily conceive a case in which a large capitalist who has numerous other undertakings of far greater importance to him than his shares in a certain commercial enterprize may be a large shareholder and yet exert no more influence than attaches to the bare number of his shares, simply because the other shareholders are aware that his interest is not the same as their own. That appears to me to be our case in the present instance, for it must be evident to all the other shareholders of the Canal that our chief interest is not, like theirs, to make the concern a profitable one. Our position with regard to the Canal is very different from theirs. We are looking upon it in a very different light from that in which it is regarded by the other shareholders, and so long as we cannot overbear them with our votes I do not see how we shall gain any influence by the large number of shares we have purchased. I think, therefore, we have a right to demand a more satisfactory answer from the Government as to the advantages to be gained by the purchase of these shares. Besides, with regard to the mission of Mr. Cave, the Government have not given the House all the information which would have been desirable, or given any answer to the objections raised against the mission itself. It is true we are not directly called upon to express an opinion on that subject to-night, but to my mind it is impossible to dissociate the two events. Both in Papers which have been published and in speeches which have been delivered, an attempt has been made to prove that the purchase of shares in the Suez Canal and Mr. Cave's mission to Egypt are not in the least connected with each other. But when the Government on one day, or on two successive days, comes to two important decisions affecting the same country, it is at least difficult to believe that there is no connection between them. How does the matter stand? It appears to me to stand in this way. In the payment of the £4,000,000 I maintain we have entered on a double transaction; we have purchased the reversion of certain shares, and we have lent a certain sum to the Khedive. I do not find fault with the transaction. It is perfectly legitimate. At the same time we sent out a special mission to inquire into the affairs of the Khedive, which we know have been for some time in an embarrassed condition. Well, what is the obvious inference to be derived from this? That a financial intervention of some kind or another in the affairs of the Khedive is, or was, contemplated by the Government. Such an action had very properly been characterized as mischievous and absurd. The result has been what was expected. Mr. Cave has gone out; he has been at work; he has examined into the financial condition of the Khedive. With what result? Has he been able to inform the Government of the kind of assistance wanted by the Khedive, or the nature of the appointment that would be offered to the gentleman that would be sent out? No; but Mr. Rivers Wilson has gone out with undefined powers and position, constituting himself a second mission, to inquire into the nature of the appointment and to exercise his own judgment. In fact, Mr. Rivers Wilson proposes to himself exactly those points which Mr. Cave was to find out for the Government. I cannot help thinking that, under the circumstances, the full history of Mr. Cave's mission has not been laid before us, and that financial intervention may still be contemplated in regard to the affairs of the Khedive. It may be asked, what harm is there in that intervention? There is this harm. Either the Government has seriously intended to involve this country in vast liabilities which it is not disposed to undertake, or else it has placed the country in a position which redounds neither to its credit nor reputation. We all know what the person who unnecessarily interferes in the business of other people meets with; but what is to be said of a person who thus interferes who is possessed of vast resources, and who, after he has interfered and raised high expectations, steadily refuses to move one of his fingers to help those with whom he has meddled? This is not the position in which the Government ought to be placed, and the Government either has involved us in great liabilities, or it has placed us in a false and humiliating position.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, although, according to the noble Lord, we are going to give a unanimous vote, it cannot be denied that the discussion of this evening at least has proved one result. It has shown, in a manner about which neither the House of Commons nor the country can make any mistake, that had the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich been the Prime Minister of this country, the shares in the Suez Canal would not have been purchased. The right hon. Gentleman, in his numerous observations upon the Vote before the House, has divided them under two heads—what he calls the operation and the policy. The right hon. Gentleman found great fault with the conduct of the operation; and though that is not the more important portion of the business, and though it is one which I could have wished to refrain from touching, from the personal details that must be involved necessarily in such a discussion, still as the question has been not only noticed by the two right hon. critics of the evening, but by some who followed them, I have no wish to avoid it, and I certainly shall encounter that question. The right hon. Gentleman defies me to produce an instance of a Ministry negotiating with a private firm. Well, I think the right hon. Gentleman must be in error. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Those were not at all my words.] Unfortunately, we are all on this side under the impression that those were the words. I listened attentively to the right hon. Gentlemen, but it is unnecessary to dwell upon the topic. I was only going to say that I doubted the accuracy of the statement; but I conceive it has nothing to do with the matter before us, which is of an unprecedented character, as I was going to show. The right hon. Gentleman found great fault with the amount of the commission which has been charged by the Messrs. Rothschild and admitted by the Government; and, indeed, both the right hon. Gentlemen opposite took the pains to calculate what was the amount of interest which it was proposed the Messrs. Rothschild should receive on account of their advance. It is, according to both right hon. Gentlemen, 15 per cent; but I must express my surprise that two right hon. Gentlemen, both of whom have filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and one of whom has been at the head of the Treasury, should have shown by their observations such a lamentable want of acquaintance with the manner in which large amounts of capital are commanded when the Government of a country may desire to possess them under the circumstances under which we appealed to the House in question. I deny altogether that the commission charged by the Messrs. Rothschild has anything to do with the interest on the advance; nor can I suppose that two right hon. Gentlemen so well acquainted with finance as the Member for Greenwich and the Member for the University of London can really believe that there is in this country anyone who has £4,000,000 lying idle at his bankers. Yet one would suppose, from the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, that such is the assumption on which he has formed his opinion in this matter. In the present instance, I may observe, not only the possibility, but the probability, of our having immediately to advance the whole £4,000,000 was anticipated. And how was this £4,000,000 to be obtained? Only by the rapid conversion of securities to the same amount. Well, I need not tell anyone who is at all acquainted with such affairs that the rapid conversion of securities to the amount of £4,000,000 can never be effected without loss, and sometimes considerable loss; and it is to guard against risk of that kind that a commission is asked for before advances are made to a Government. In this case, too, it was more than probable that, after paying the first £1,000,000, following the signature of the contract, £2,000,000 further might be demanded in gold the next day. Fortunately for the Messrs. Rothschild they were not; but, if they had, there would in all likelihood have been a great disturbance in the Money Market, which must have occasioned a great sacrifice, perhaps the whole of the commission. The Committee, therefore, must not be led away by the observations of the two right hon. Gentlemen, who, of all men in the House, ought to be the last to make them. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich says we ought to have gone to our constitutional financiers and advisers, the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, and, of course, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who rose much later in the debate, and who spoke evidently under the influence of strong feeling, also says that we ought to have asked the Governor of the Bank of England to advance the £4,000,000. But they forget that it is against the law of this country for the Bank to advance a sum of money to the Ministry. But then it may be said—"Though the Bank could not have advanced the £4,000,000, you might have asked them to purchase the shares." But how could they have purchased the shares? They must have first consulted their legal adviser, who probably would have told them that they had not power to do it; but, even if that doubtful question had been decided in the affirmative, they must have then called a public Court in order to see whether they could be authorized to purchase those shares to assist the Government. Now, I ask the Committee to consider for a moment what chance would we have had of effecting the purchase which we made under the circumstances, and with the competitors we had to encounter, and the objects we had to attain, if we had pursued the course which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has suggested? "But," says the Member for the University of London—and this also has been echoed by his late right hon. Colleague—"you would have avoided all this, if you adopted the course which we indicate, and which I have just reminded the Committee is illegal, if you had only taken the illegal course we recommend, you would have got rid of this discreditable gambling, because although the Messrs. Rothschild, some of whom have been Members of this House, are men of honour, yet they have a great number of clerks who were all gambling on the Stock Exchange." Now, my belief is that the Messrs. Rothschild kept the secret as well as Her Majesty's Government, for I do not think a single human being connected with them knew anything about it. And, indeed, it was quite unnecessary for the Messrs. Rothschild to have violated the confidence which we reposed in them, and quite unnecessary even for the Members of Her Majesty's Government to hold their tongues, for no sooner was the proposal accepted than a telegram from Grand Cairo transmitted the news to the Stock Exchange, and it was that telegram which was the cause of all the speculation and gambling to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred. It is a fact that while the matter was a dead secret in England, the news was transmitted from Cairo. That was the intelligence on which the operations occurred. But I wish to say one word respecting the moral observations which have been made. As to gambling on the Stock Exchange, are we really to refrain from doing that which we think is proper and advantageous to the country because it may lead to speculation? Why, not a remark was made by the noble Lord, who has just addressed the House, the other night, or by me in reply, that would not affect the funds. On the one side people would say—"The Government are in great difficulty, and probably a Vote of Censure will arise out of this Suez Canal speculation," while other persons would observe—"There is evidently something coming about Egypt, and he is not going to let it all out." Ought we to refrain from doing what is necessary for the public welfare because it leads to stock-jobbing? Why, there is not an incident in the history of the world that led to so much stock-jobbing as the battle of Waterloo, and are we to regret that that glorious battle was fought and won because it led to stock-jobbing? So much for the operations on the Stock Exchange. I think we have been listening all night to remarks on this transaction that have very little foundation. We have been admonished for conduct which has led to stock-jobbing and we have been admonished because we applied to a private firm when, from the state of the law, I have shown that it was absolutely necessary from the character of the circumstances we had to deal with that a private firm should be appealed to. And now I come to the policy of the two right hon. Gentlemen, for on that portion of the subject they appear to agree very much. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London says—"You have your shares, but you have no dividends." And the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich says—"You have your shares, but you have no votes." That is the great lamentation of the two right hon. Gentlemen. Shrieking and screaming out—"You have no votes and no dividends, though you have the shares," they account for conduct on the part of the Government so totally devoid of sense and calculation as that the Government should become encumbered with all these shares, and yet possess neither the advantage of dividends nor of voting power. They say this is due to the simple circumstance that we acted in total ignorance, that we were innocent—nay, more than innocent—and that the most becoming thing for us to do would be to acknowledge and, at the same time, to regret our fault. Instead of that, they say we triumph in our ignorance, and they absolutely pretend that we were aware of the immense blunder we have committed. It is very remarkable that the two right hon. Gentlemen should have ventured to take up such a position in this case. What is this question of the Suez Canal? From the numerous Papers which have been placed before the House, the House must be tolerably aware that during the whole period of the existence of the present Parliament the question of the Suez Canal has more or less been before us. I am not sure that in the first Cabinet Council we held some decision was not come to on the subject. Then the International Commission at Constantinople had either just terminated, or was involving the Government in a painful and difficult Correspondence. We were represented at the International Commission by Colonel Stokes, who is completely master of the subject, an invaluable public servant, and a man of great intelligence, and who had completely mastered all the details of what was then a very complicated question. From that time until we made the purchase in October last Colonel Stokes has been in almost constant attendance at the Foreign Office. The question of the Suez Canal was constantly before us, and therefore I need not go further to show to the Committee that, although it happened to be a subject upon which we were called in the present instance to decide hastily, we had the advantage of much previous knowledge. Why, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was intimately acquainted with the subject, and was himself present at the opening of the Suez Canal. Nothing, in short, can be more unfounded than the assumption of the two right hon. Gentlemen, who wished to convey to the House that Her Majesty's Government had entered into their agreement in perfect ignorance of all the circumstances of the case. This, in fact, was the style of the whole speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). Take this away; convince the right hon. Gentleman—or convince, what is easier and more satisfactory, the Committee—that we were aware of these circumstances, and the right hon. Gentleman himself confesses that he might as well have made no speech at all. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) proceeds in his attack in his own way, and makes a great many objections, but takes up two great positions as grounds of condemnation. "First of all," he says, "I object to this purchase, because it will give you no influence." That is the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman. I might meet it with a counter assertion. I might offer many arguments to show that it will give us a great deal of influence. I might refer to that which has already occurred, and which, though not in its results very considerable, shows some advantage from what has been done, while before a year has elapsed it will possibly show much more. I might refer to the general conviction and the common sense of society that such an investment cannot be treated as absolutely idle and nugatory, as the right hon. Gentleman wishes to treat it. The right hon. Gentleman takes a position from which it is certainly difficult to dislodge him, because it is perfectly arbitrary. He says—"You have no votes." He views the question abstractedly. He says—"Here is a company, and you have a great many shares in it, but you are not allowed to vote, and therefore it follows you can have no influence." But everybody knows that in the world things are not managed in that way, and that if you have a large amount of capital in any concern, whatever may be the restrictions under which it is invested, the capitalist does exercise influence. Then the right hon. Gentleman says—"You have no real control over the purchase you have made; and yet that purchase will lead to great complications." Sir, I have no doubt that complications will occur. They always have occurred, and I should like to know the state of affairs and of society in which complications do not and will not occur. We are here to guard the country against complications, and to guide it in the event of complications; and the argument that we are to do nothing—never dare to move, never try to increase our strength and improve our position, because we are afraid of complications is certainly a new view of English policy, and one which I believe the House of Commons will never sanction. I think under these two heads all the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman are contained. But the noble Lord who has just addressed us says many points were made by the right hon. Gentleman which the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not answer. There is no precedent of a British Ministry treating with a private firm; my right hon. Friend did not answer that. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I did not say so.] The right

hon. Gentleman, however, says he made no observation of the kind. Then the noble Lord says my right hon. Friend never answered the charge about speculations in Egyptian Stock. Well, I have answered that charge. The noble Lord says my right hon. Friend never touched upon the amount of the commission. I have touched upon it. He says that we never thoroughly cleared ourselves from the charge of not buying the 15 per cent shares. I am here to vindicate our conduct on that point. In purchasing the shares we did, we purchased what we wanted, we gained the end we wished, and why we should involve the country in another purchase, when we should thereby only have repeated the result we had already achieved I cannot understand. The noble Lord says my right hon. Friend never expressed what expectations we had of receiving the £200,000 a-year from the Khedive. We certainly do expect to receive the £200,000 a-year from the Khedive, but we do not suppose that interest which is at the rate of 5 per cent is quite as secure as it would be if it were at the rate of  $3\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. Then the noble Lord says that my right hon. Friend never met the charge of the right hon. Gentleman that our policy would lead to complications with other nations. We believe, on the contrary, that, instead of leading to complications with other nations, the step which we have taken is one which will avert complications. These are matters which to a great degree must be matters of opinion; but the most remarkable feature of the long harangue of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich is that it was in a great degree a series of assumptions, abstract reasonings, and arbitrary conclusions, after which he sat down quite surprised that the Vote should be passed unanimously, and requesting his allies to attack us for not answering that which we have felt not to be substantial, but to consist of assumptions which we believe experience will prove to be entirely false. The right hon. Gentleman charged us, lastly, with not having answered a charge of having abandoned a strong position. The right hon. Gentleman pictured us as having been in a good position before this—a position which he charged us with having abandoned for one of a more doubtful character. Here again, what proof does he bring of the charge he makes? We found ourselves in a position which has been called a strong position, but we could not for a moment think that our position with regard to the Canal was satisfactory. The International Commission sat, as hon. Members know, before the Conservatives acceded to power, and the work it did was greatly assisted by our Predecessors, and by a number of other able and eminent men; but, as I have said, no one who remembers all the circumstances of the case and what has occurred since, can for a moment pretend that our position with regard to the Canal was then satisfactory. At that moment Turkey was in a very different position from that which she occupies at present, as far as authority is concerned. The Khedive himself was in a very good position; and yet those who are familiar with what occurred at that time know the great difficulties which the Government experienced, and the very doubtful manner in which, for a considerable time, affairs looked with regard to the whole business. Therefore I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. I feel that at this moment our position is much stronger, and for the reason that we are possessors of a great portion of the capital invested in the Canal. The noble Lord himself has expressed great dissatisfaction, because I have not told him what the conduct of the Government would be with regard to the Canal in a time of war. I must say that on this subject I wish to retain my reserve. I cannot conceive anything more imprudent than a discussion in this House at the present time as to the conduct of England with regard to the Suez Canal in time of war, and I shall therefore decline to enter upon any discussion on the subject. Then the noble Lord passed to the mission of Mr. Cave, and says we have no good account to give of it. It is impossible to give a good account of a mission which is not yet finished. I believe the mission of Mr. Cave to be a wise and a beneficial one, and I look with confidence to satisfactory results flowing from it; but really that mission has nothing to do with the Vote of the evening, and it will be much better to defer any discussion concerning it until we have fuller information before us, and when the Envoy is himself—as I hope he soon will be—in his place in Parliament. What we have to do tonight is to agree to the Vote for the purchase of these shares. I have never recommended, and I do not now recommend this purchase as a financial investment. If it gave us 10 per cent of interest and a security as good as the Consols, I do not think an English Minister would be justified in making such an investment; still less if he is obliged to borrow the money for the occasion. I do not recommend it either as a commercial speculation, although I believe that many of those who have looked upon it with little favour will probably be surprised with the pecuniary results of the purchase. I have always, and do now recommend it to the country as a political transaction, and one which I believe is calculated to strengthen the Empire. That is the spirit in which it has been accepted by the country, which understands it though the two right hon. critics may not. They are really sea-sick of the "Silver Streak." They want the Empire to be maintained, to be strengthened; they will not be alarmed even it be increased. Because they think we are obtaining a great hold and interest in this important portion of Africa—because they believe that it secures to us a highway to our Indian Empire and our other dependencies, the people of England have from the first recognized the propriety and the wisdom of the step which we shall sanction to-night.

UNITED PARISHES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Mr. M'Lagan.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DALRYMPLE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was the same as a measure which was introduced last Session, but which, owing to pressure of time and an opposition now not repeated, had never got beyond a first reading. The Act of 1844, known as Sir James Graham's Act, was an Act for disjoining parishes and erecting new parishes, and the 8th section of that Act sanctioned the erection of quoad sacra parishes in connection with the Church of Scotland. But that Act dealt only with Parliamentary charges and chapels of ease, and omitted to deal with united parishes, of which there were several in Scotland. A "united parish" was what was known as a double charge, with two glebes, but only one minister; and the Act of 1868, called the "United Parishes Act," introduced into the House by private Members—one of whom was Sir James Fergusson, a near relative of his own—but having the support of Government, attempted to supply the defect by making these parishes divisible and providing that one of the churches separated from the Mother Church should be declared the church of a new parish quoad sacra. Unfortunately, however, that Act did only half its work. It failed to deal with the double glebe, and its provisions were rendered nugatory, because no arrangement was made for one of the glebes going with the quoad sacra church. The present Bill was consequently introduced to complete what the Act of 1868 omitted. It made as little change as was possible, and one of the sections provided that the heritors should not be liable to any increased liability. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

HORSHAM WRIT.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Horsham, in the room of Robert Henry Hurst, whose Election has been determined to be void.—(Mr. Adam.)

TENANT RIGHT AT THE EXPIRATION OF LEASES BILL.

On Motion of MR. MULHOLLAND, Bill to facilitate the proof of the Ulster Tenant Right Custom at the Expiration of Leases in certain cases, ordered to be brought in by MR. MULHOLLAND, LORD ARTHUR EDWIN HILL-TREVOR, THE MARQUESS OF HAMILTON, CAPTAIN CORRY, and MR. CHAINE.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 22nd February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—

PATENT LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in presenting a Bill for the amendment of the Patent Laws, said, that their Lordships might recollect that last Session a Bill for the amendment of the Patent Laws passed through their Lordships' House, and went down to the other House of Parliament; but the state of Public Business at that time made it impossible to carry it through. By their Lordships' favour, he was permitted, when introducing the Bill, to explain at great length its objects, and he certainly should not think of trespassing now on their Lordships' indulgence by any lengthened statement:—but he was anxious, in asking permission to read the Bill a first time this Session, to state that there would be found in it two important provisions differing from the former Bill. They were these:—The proposal of the Bill of last Session was that there should be in future two classes of Letters Patent for inventions, the one to remain in force for a period of 14 years—the present term—the other for an invention which might not seem deserving of so long a period, for the shorter term of seven years. He still thought it would not be an undesirable arrangement that there should be a distinction of that kind, having reference to the subject-matter of the invention. However, he had found many objections raised to that proposal by persons much concerned with patents; and they suggested so strongly that it would lead to uncertainty or to litigation, as to whether an invention should be entitled to seven or to 14 years' protection, that he had thought it right to omit that provision and to propose that patents should be given a protection for the uniform term of 14 years. The other alteration was of a different kind. In the Bill of last Session it was proposed, as the machinery for carrying it out, that the granting of Letters Patent should be under the direction and superintendence of the Commissioners of Patents; that under them there should be Examiners of Patents, who should carefully examine as to the sufficiency of the specifications, and ascertain whether any previous patent had been granted for the same inventions. And then it was proposed that another class of persons—the Referees—not connected with the Patent Office, persons engaged in scientific pursuits, or conversant with the applied sciences, might be resorted to in the consideration of any particular patent, for the purpose of giving advice upon it. Here again he found considerable unwillingness to accede to an arrangement of that kind. On the one hand it was said that the services of persons sufficiently competent to give the required advice could not be obtained, except at a price that would be disproportioned to what would be the cost of the patent; and on the other, that great jealousies would be aroused by the selection of persons called upon to pronounce upon patents about to be brought before the public. With respect to that part of the Bill, therefore, he had thought it best to confine its machinery to the Commissioners of Patents, and, under them, the Examiners, the regular officers of the Patent Office. These were the two principal points in the new Bill to which he had now to ask their Lordships to give a first reading.

Bill for consolidating with Amendments the Acts relating to Letters Patent for Inventions presented; read 1st; and to be printed; and to be read 2<sup>d</sup> on Tuesday the 7th of March next. (No. 15.)

TION.—QUESTION.

LORD COTTESLOE, according to Notice, asked the Lord President to inform the House, if in his power to do so, When the Report of the Royal Commission on Accidents on Railways will be presented; and, whether the Government propose to introduce any Bill or Bills on the subject during the present Session? The subject of loss of life at sea had engaged no small share of the attention of the House of Commons during last Session and the portion of the present Session which had already elapsed. It might not be that the loss of life by a single railway accident was so great as that caused by the sinking of a ship at sea; but if the calamitous results of railway accidents were regarded in the aggregate he doubted whether they would not be found quite as appalling as the accidents which occurred on the sea. Their Lordships' House had already shown how sensible it was of the importance of the subject, because it was on an Address agreed to and presented by their Lordships in 1874 that the Royal Commission to inquire into the regulation and working of railways, and to report on the best means to be adopted for the prevention of accidents was appointed. He thought, however, that when that Commission was appointed few, if any, of their Lordships anticipated that two years would elapse without a Report from them. It now, however, appeared to be not improbable that yet another year might pass before the Commission reported. He by no means wished to undervalue the magnitude of the task entrusted to the Commission, and he could quite understand that the appointment of its Chairman (the Duke of Buckingham) to the office which he now filled in India had caused a delay. No doubt an elaborate Report would be presented, and Parliament might expect to see a comprehensive measure founded on that Report; but all this would take time, and there was the probability that railway accidents which might be prevented would continue to occur in the meantime. It was clear enough, therefore, that the proceedings of the Commission were not fast enough to meet the urgency of the subject. He could not but think that the Royal Commission, if directed to do so, might be disposed to make a preliminary Report on which a Bill dealing with the most pressing necessities of the case might be prepared and passed into law during the present Session.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that nobody could be insensible to the importance of the subject. The appointment of the Royal Commission was a proof that Parliament and Her Majesty's Government felt its importance; but, as his noble Friend admitted, the subject was a very large as well as a very important one. The absence from this country of the noble Duke the Chairman of the Commission had no doubt retarded its proceedings;

but it must be remembered that in order to obtain full information and arrive at sound conclusions, the Commissioners had been obliged to take evidence over the whole country. In the temporary absence of Lord De La Warr, who had succeeded the Duke of Buckingham as Chairman, but who was now abroad, Lord Aberdeen was acting as Chairman, and the Commissioners were proceeding with their Report. All the evidence had been closed; but he could not hold out any hope that the Report would be presented this side of the Easter Recess. He could not agree with the noble Lord (Lord Cottesloe) that a preliminary Report from the Commission as a basis for legislation would be desirable. It would be impossible to expect any Department of the Government to undertake the preparation of a Bill on imperfect information, and it would be no less unreasonable to ask Parliament to legislate before it was put in possession of the matured views of the Commission and of the evidence on which those views had been formed. He could, however, assure the House that the greatest care was taken in the preparation of the Report, and that there would be no unnecessary delay in its production.

ARMY—THE MARTINI-HENRY RIFLE. QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS, in rising to put the Question of which he had given Notice, with respect to alleged defects in the Martini-Henry rifle, said, he was afraid from all accounts that we were somewhat in the case of the epitaph—"I was well, I would be better—here I am." He was afraid we had exchanged a fairly good weapon in the Snider for the Martini-Henry, and that it had not realized the expectations formed of it. This was no Party question—it would be difficult, if one wished it, to know who to blame. The military authorities were relieved of the responsibility of choosing the arm they required by a Committee being appointed, and though the Government had been a long time in discovering the defects, yet their predecessors adopted the rifle. It was of the highest importance that the weapon supplied to the English Army should be the very best that could be procured, and it would doubtless be a vast disappointment to the country, after the large sums expended, if it was found that we had not a perfect arm; but it would be better to look this in the face, if it was not so, rather than leave our soldiers with a weapon in which they had no confidence. He hoped, however, that the reports he had heard would prove to be exaggerations. He spoke under contradiction from the illustrious Duke, and from the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War (Earl Cadogan), but he was told on good authority that between 60 and 70 of the Martini-Henry rifles had become unfit for service in a battalion of Guards alone during the last Autumn Manœuvres, and he believed complaints were received last year of the rifle from various foreign stations. But what was most important was the despatch of Lieutenant Hinxman, from Malay, describing the rifle in the first and only time it had as yet been used in action. He said—

“I was much disappointed with the new rifles. When they got hot the extractor became jammed, and eight or 10 of my men told me their rifles were useless, so I told them to take the wounded men's rifles.”

Now, if the Martini-Henry was ineffective against foes, it seemed also to be somewhat dangerous to friends. It seemed that a small quantity of sand or dirt getting into the lock would make the pull a hair-trigger. It was not pleasant to know that the man standing behind one had a hair-trigger, but it was doubly unpleasant if one knew that it was not only a hair-trigger, but one which necessarily must stand at full-cock. Might he ask any of their Lordships what would be their feelings if they were asked to join a shooting party who were to go over rough ground and through fences, and who were carrying guns which only could stand at full-cock? From no wish to embarrass the Government, but as sharing the general anxiety which was felt on this important subject, he begged to ask, Whether any reports have been received during the past year with respect to defects in the Martini-Henry Rifle; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay such Reports on the Table; and to state the steps (if any) which have been taken, and the estimated cost per rifle of rectifying the defects complained of?

EARL CADOGAN, in reply, said, that reports had been received during the past year with reference to defects in the Martini-Henry rifle, and there was no objection to lay those Reports on the Table of the House. Among these complaints some referred to the sighting, some to irregularity of pull, others to the difficulty of extracting the emptied cartridges in certain cases, and, in isolated instances, to the weapon going off in the act of closing the lever. It was found also that the pull could be injured by a small amount of dust or dirt getting between the shoulder of the trigger and the trigger-plate, and that by the insertion of a piece of paper or other foreign substance, the trigger might be converted into a hair-trigger, and so the rifle might go off unexpectedly and cause accident. No such accident had occurred at Enfield since the manufacture of those rifles was commenced there, though, of course, an immense number of rounds had been fired at Enfield with them. But the possibility of the occurrence had been deemed so serious that in October last a Conference of Officers had met to consider the matter, and, on the suggestion of the Superintendent of the Small Arms Factory, they came to the conclusion that a plan of counter-sinking the shoulder of the trigger and a slight additional improvement in the details of the manufacture of the weapon would afford a remedy for the danger. At a meeting of the Conference of the same officers in January it was recommended that the necessary alteration should be made in the weapon. This alteration would cost only 3s. for each rifle; it did not affect the principle, nor would it involve the return of the rifle into the factory. With regard to “half-cock”—which some persons considered a source of danger rather than of safety—the Conference, after much deliberation, did not recommend it. He had had a letter sent to him by Colonel Close, written by Lieutenant Abbott, whose name their Lordships would remember in connection with the murder of Mr. Birch, in which that officer said—“I wish my father to tell Colonel Close that the Martini rifle did very well.” With respect to the extraction of the emptied cartridge, that was found to be the result of neglecting to extract the case immediately after firing, as, when the weapon cooled, the metal of the chamber contracted and held it fast; but by a new drill regulation, requiring the soldier to extract the spent cartridge after firing, that difficulty would be avoided. The Martini-Henry rifle had been chosen for the British Army, after a long and anxious deliberation, by what he thought he might fairly call representative Committees. A sum of £1,400,000 had been already spent on the manufacture of that arm and the ammunition necessary for it, and therefore it was most desirable to render the weapon perfect by remedying any deficiencies. The analogy sought to be drawn by the noble Duke from the epitaph he had repeated to their Lordships hardly existed in this case, because the dead man had called in the physician when he was perfectly well; whereas, as regarded the Martini rifle, it was found to be necessary from real defects to call in the physician. But if, as was believed by competent authorities, its defects could be remedied, he thought their Lordships would be disposed to think it was the duty of the Government to do their best to make it a complete success.

EARL GREY concurred with the noble Earl who had just addressed their Lordships that after so much money had been expended on the Martini-Henry rifle, the Government ought to try and make it a satisfactory weapon; but he still more concurred with his noble Friend the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) when he said we ought to look the matter in the face, and whatever we might have spent upon Martini-Henry rifles, we ought not to be afraid to ascertain whether they really were open to the objections urged against them. If they were, we were bound to give them up, and ought not to leave the British soldier with any but the best weapon. It was said that after a number of shots had been fired from the Martini-Henry rifle, the recoil was such as to interfere with the correctness of the aim. Information on this and other points in connection with the weapon would be very desirable for Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he could repeat what had been said by his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War—that the introduction of the Martini-Henry rifle had not been undertaken hastily by the late Government. From 1866, when General Peel advertized for the best breech-loading weapon for the British Army, there had been almost incessant inquiries into this subject, and it was not until their conclusion that the Martini-Henry rifle had been adopted, with the full concurrence of the Commander-in-Chief, by the late Government. The reports of a large number of regiments, as to the performance of the Martini-Henry rifle, were highly satisfactory; and he believed it was stated on good authority that its recoil was not greater than that of the Snider and other rifles. As against the Report of Lieutenant Hinxman there was the unqualified approval of the naval officer of the expedition. As to the statement of his noble Friend (the Duke of St. Albans) that the military authorities were relieved of responsibility by the appointment of Committees, he differed from that view. The responsibility lay with the military authorities. As to the objection that there was no half-cock, to meet that it had been recommended that there should be a locking bolt, but the illustrious Duke did not think that desirable.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he thought it would be very difficult to adopt any view in opposition to that of the Committees, which had gone into all the details of this question and had seen the Martini-Henry rifle under all the advantages and disadvantages of actual trial—the results of course the military authorities could only take on their dictum. Under these circumstances, responsibility must rest on the Committees as to which was the best arm. Had he been a member of the Conference he thought he would have been in favour of recommending a half-cock. Being something of a sportsman, he knew something of the apprehension felt by those who were in the immediate neighbourhood of persons who were apt to carry their fowling-pieces on full-cock. He certainly did not think a bolt would do. He certainly should prefer an arm that had a half-cock, if it was possible to have one equally efficient with that arrangement, to the Martini-Henry without it. The theory was that breech-loading arms ought not to be loaded until they were about to be used, and therefore that not much danger need be incurred. Formerly, when individual men had not to make charges or rushes, there was not the same difficulty; but now, when a man was left so much to his individual action, there was more danger in intrusting him with a loaded musket on full-cock. But to gain so many advantages as are now sought for we must submit to certain disadvantages. No doubt there had been complaints of the Martini-Henry rifle going off in some cases without the trigger having been touched; but it was said that this might be completely prevented in the manufacture of the weapon. As to the recoil, he believed that the complaint of the objectionable amount of recoil had been caused by the butt having been made too long, which prevented the soldier from getting it up close to his shoulder. In all cases, whenever a new arm was adopted, it would be found necessary, after actual service, to make adjustments and improvements. There must be a trial of the weapon in actual service. Firing a number of shots at Enfield was a very different thing from giving the rifles to ordinary men to be knocked about. It must be remembered, too, that the capability of men to handle and take care of their weapons greatly differed, and that small mishaps were sure to occur. He was satisfied, however, that the arm was a good arm. As to the difficulty of extracting the emptied cartridges owing to the shrinking of the barrel, that showed how difficult it was to foresee all difficulties of detail. At first it had not been thought necessary to order in the drill regulations that spent cartridges should be extracted immediately after firing; but as such a regulation had since been made, that difficulty was not likely to occur again. With respect to the arm itself, he thought it right to say that 100 different kinds of weapons were produced when it was first submitted to competition. A certain number of those were withdrawn by the manufacturers themselves; a certain number were set aside, the best were selected, and of these the Martini-Henry was finally adopted as the best shooting arm that could be had.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL hoped their Lordships were not understood to be debating the question whether the British soldier ought to be armed with the best possible weapon:—at whatever the cost the British soldier should have that weapon. He hoped, also, that they were not debating as to who was responsible for the adoption of the Martini-Henry rifle. He shrank from no responsibility in connection with it. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would lay on the Table the results of the experiments which had been made within the last few months, that they might know whether this was—as he believed it to be—or was not the best weapon supplied to any army in Europe. He did not altogether agree with the illustrious Duke that the responsibility belonged to the Committee which had recommended it. As regarded the history of this rifle, in March, 1867, a most important and valuable Committee, consisting of some of the greatest rifle shots in the Kingdom and of some experienced soldiers, were appointed to inquire into the matter. They took a long time in their examination, and did not report till after he had come into office as Secretary for War, which he thought was an interval of two years from the time of their appointment. But the Government of which he was a Member did not act on the Report of that Committee. They assembled at the War Office some of the most experienced soldiers of this country. They recommended that 200 rifles should be made at Enfield and issued to the troops for trial. They were tried not only in this country, but in India, the Cape, and Canada. Well, when the reports came in the Committee was re-constituted, and Lord Elcho, who was Chairman of the Council of the Volunteers at Wimbledon, and the President of the Society of Civil Engineers were added to the Committee. The question was again considered by that Committee, who made their Report—again most favourable to the Martini-Henry. But the Government did not act on that Report. They assembled another body of most distinguished soldiers. This body again recommended the Martini-Henry rifle; it was approved by the Board of Admiralty; it had the high sanction of the illustrious Duke, and it was not until after all these things that it was adopted by the late Government. But it was not they only that had adopted it, any more than it was they who appointed the original Committee, because his right hon. Friend the present Secretary for War, he was told, went most carefully into an examination of the subject, and, having done so, largely increased the orders which the late Government had given for making them. He also took steps for issuing the rifle to the Infantry.

But the real question was not the history of the case. The real question was the character of the arm. If the Martini-Henry was not the best, they were not justified in continuing it. He hoped that we should not rely upon the newspaper reports, of which the noble Earl on the cross-benches had spoken, inserted very likely by disappointed inventors; but that we should be put in possession of the official reports made by the School of Musketry at Hythe and the regiments which had tried it.

EARL CADOGAN said, he had not troubled their Lordships with any remarks upon what he understood had been unanimously conceded—the great superiority of the Martini-Henry rifle as a weapon of precision. He could not promise to produce the Papers asked for by the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) without consulting the Secretary of State for War, but he had no doubt he should be able to produce them. He might state generally that the Reports which had been received were of a most satisfactory character, and bore out the description of this arm as the best that could be produced.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 22nd February, 1876.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—Resolution [February 21] reported.

EXTRADITION TREATIES.—QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to extend as far as possible Extradition Treaties to countries where such treaties do not at present exist?

MR. BOURKE: Yes. Treaties are in course of negotiation with France, the United States, Belgium, and the Netherlands for superseding those now existing. Treaties are also in course of negotiation with Spain, Ecuador, the Argentine Confederation, Chili, Peru, and Venezuela.

ARMY—ADJUTANTS OF MILITIA.

QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the Secretary of State for War, If Adjutants of Militia, who are also Captains in the Army, command the Captains of the Militia Battalions to which they have been gazetted, while they are serving with such Battalions?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that a Circular would shortly be issued which would enable adjutants to take rank in the Militia according to the date of their commissions in the Army.

INDIA—ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State has received a reply from the Government of India to the Despatch of the 6th July 1872, on the subject of the Indian Ecclesiastical Establishments; and, whether he will lay the Correspondence upon the Table?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, in the Parliamentary Return, No. 181, 1875, there were several letters, or extracts of letters, between the Government of India and the Secretary of State subsequent to the despatch of the 6th of July, 1872. With the exception of the telegram which he read out to the hon. Gentleman the other night there was nothing to lay upon the Table of the House. The despatch, of which the telegram was the embodiment, would shortly arrive, and there was no objection to making it public.

MINES—ACCIDENTS IN COAL MINES.

QUESTION.

MR. SIDEBOTTOM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the frequency of explosions and serious accidents in coal mines, and if he has considered whether "any fresh regulations can be laid down by which some further guarantees may be obtained that all due precautions shall be taken against accidents, and that the very large sum of money expended on the inspection of mines shall bear the fruit it ought to bear," in accordance with his promise made July 27th 1874?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the frequency of explosions and accidents in coal mines was a matter about which he felt very much interested, and last year he referred it to the Inspectors of Mines and to Inspectors generally at their annual meeting; but, unfortunately, there was a great difference of opinion among them. The matter had not, in the meantime, been lost sight of by him. He had referred this question to them at the meeting held that day, and he hoped to receive their report to-morrow, and to be able in a very short time to do something which might tend to prevent these explosions and accidents.

LAW AND JUSTICE—CASE OF MR. R. G. WILBERFORCE.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to two actions which were tried in the Westminster County Court on the 27th January last, before a jury, in which damages to the amount of £15 5s. were recovered against Reginald Garton Wilberforce, esquire, of the Temple and of Graffham, Sussex, barrister at law, and justice of the peace for the county of Sussex, for assaulting two boys, the sons of an agricultural labourer, by removing their clothes and violently flogging them on their bare bodies until they were covered with blood, for the offence of digging a rabbit out of a hedge on his estate, the defendant having given them the alternative of submitting to be whipped or of being prosecuted before the bench of which he was a member; whether he has caused inquiry to be made into the circumstances under which those assaults were committed; and, whether he has made, or proposes to make, any representation to the Lord Chancellor, with a view to the removal of Mr. Wilberforce from the bench of magistrates?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have communicated with Mr. Wilberforce since this Question was put on the Paper, and I am authorized by him to state that there are one or two inaccuracies in the Question placed upon the Paper, the main one being the statement that he was a member of the bench of magistrates before whom this case would naturally have been brought. But I also thought it my duty to communicate with the County Court Judge who tried the action. I think the best answer I can give is to read his answer. He says—

"The boys were found rabbiting in Mr. Wilberforce's land, not for the first time. Mr. W. complained to their father; he would not, he said, prosecute such youngsters, and he asked the father to punish them. The father said he could not flog them himself, because his hand was disabled; but he asked Mr. W. to flog them, and promised to send them to him for that purpose. Accordingly, the following morning, the boys went to Mr. W. He asked them would they take a flogging or go to Petworth; each said he would rather have a flogging; each let down his own clothes; each stood, and Mr. W. flogged each of them with a birch rod, but did not lay his hand on either of them. He gave each of them such a flogging as a boy at Eton would have got in my time. The younger boy boasted a day or two after that he did not mind it a bit. The question left to the jury was whether the flogging was, under the circumstances, too severe. They found for the plaintiff—damages, £10. The jury probably wished to mark their disapproval of Mr. W. thus placing himself in loco parentis; but had the facts been as suggested by Mr. Taylor they would, I have no doubt, have given much larger damages. I thought the maxim volenti non fit injuria applied except as to any excess, and that the law was not as stated in the 'Pleader's Guide' as the result of 'Matthews v. Offerton,' that famous beating in 'Comberbach,' 218—

'Where one a beating underwent

By his own license and consent,

Court held, and so 'twas understood,

The license void, the beating good.'"

I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the flogging was an error of judgment on the part of Mr. Wilberforce. I have his authority to say that it is a matter which he most deeply regrets. In conclusion I can only say, in answer to the last part of the Question, that the act of Mr. Wilberforce was not a part of his duty as a magistrate. What he did was not done in his judicial capacity.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR gave Notice that on an early occasion he would call the attention of the House to this case and move a Resolution.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies,

Whether Her Majesty's Government recognizes the claim of the French to the exclusive right of fishing on that part of the coast of Newfoundland extending from Cape Ray to Cape St. John; and, if they do not, whether they intend to take steps to prevent the French cruisers from seizing our fishermen's nets, and otherwise committing acts of interference; whether it is the case that the Newfoundland Government have recommended that a stronger naval force be kept in their waters, and if the Government intend to act on that recommendation; and, whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the complaints made of damage done to the Newfoundland fishermen by the officer commanding the French ship of war "Diamant" in 1873, and to other acts of molestation committed at various periods, as mentioned in the Fishery Reports of the Senior Naval Officers on the Newfoundland Station in 1873, 1874, and 1875?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government certainly did not recognize any claim on the part of the French to an exclusive right in the Newfoundland coast. Complaints similar to those which the hon. Gentleman had referred to had from time to time reached Her Majesty's Government, and had engaged their anxious attention. The whole subject was, however, undergoing a thorough investigation at the hands of a Joint Commission now sitting in Paris, so that he hoped an amicable settlement of all these difficulties would be shortly effected.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he would explain to the House why, by the 12th Section of the Order in Council relating to the Civil Service, writers are precluded from being appointed to the lower division of clerks unless they have, previously to the Order in Council, served as writers for a period of not less than three years, even although they can "produce certificates from the heads of the department in which they are serving that it is desirable, in the interests of the Public Service, to retain and employ them in the same department," and they can "prove their fitness by a supplementary examination?"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the object of the Order in Council was to give effect to the recommendations of the Civil Service Commissioners. They recommended the appointment of what was known as "a lower division of the Civil Service;" and if his hon. Friend had read the able Report of that Commission, he would see that they laid very great stress upon the steps which were taken for constituting that lower division, and especially they pointed out that it would lead to the entire collapse of the plan if the general body of writers should be transferred to the new lower division. The object of the Order in Council was therefore to establish the lower division upon an entirely new footing; but as a matter of equitable consideration of the claims of those who had been for a considerable time employed as writers, exceptional provision was made that, under certain circumstances, those who had been for more than three years on the list of writers might be exceptionally admitted into the lower division. The Government thought they had gone as far as it was right for them to go in making that provision. Nobody had any right to complain of not being included in this exceptional favour; because all the writers who had entered since 1870 had entered with a perfect knowledge of the terms upon which they were engaged, and they were not put in a worse position than that which they previously occupied.

TRADE UNION ACT, 1871—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is prepared to introduce a Bill to amend the Trade Union Act of 1871, in accordance with the memorial presented by a deputation on 11th November last, the proposals in which he pronounced "well deserving of consideration," and "very reasonable;" or if the Government will support such a Bill if introduced by a private Member?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: When I originally introduced the first Friendly Societies Bill I included in it some clauses relating to trade unions which would, I think, if they had been adopted with any modifications that the House might have been pleased to make, have remedied the grievances referred to in this Question. However, there was a great objection taken at that time on the part of members of trade unions to be included in such legislation, and they have accordingly been excluded from it. In the course of last Autumn I received a deputation from some gentlemen connected with trade unions, pointing out certain disadvantages under which they still labour, and I certainly did admit that their complaints were reasonable and well-founded. But I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that it does not lie with me to introduce any Bill relating to trade unions if they are dealt with separately. That is rather a matter that would come under the cognizance of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I think, however, I may say, on my right hon. Friend's behalf as well as on my own, that the most convenient course appears to be that gentlemen interested in the question should introduce a Bill containing such provisions as they think are required. If the Government should see such a Bill, and find it limited to matters that they can reasonably deal with, they will, of course, be ready to give it any proper support.

"SASSOON V. HARRIS."—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been directed to the case of Sassoon v. Harris, and the severe strictures of the Bench on the Stamp Act, reported in the "Shipping and Mercantile Gazette" of the 17th January last; and, whether he will consider the desirability of assimilating the Duty on Marine Insurance to that on Fire and Life policies?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Of course I have noticed, as everybody has done, the case in question. I understand that this is by no means the first occasion on which a similar complaint has been made. Indeed, as long ago as 1812 precisely the same difficulty was felt, and was somewhat similarly animadverted upon in a Court of Law. The hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) has introduced a Bill intended to meet this difficulty, and he has been in communication with me, and, through me, with the Board of Inland Revenue on the subject; and if an arrangement can be made as to the terms of the Bill, it will be of such a character as will obviate the difficulty complained of, which gave rise to this particular case. With regard to the last part of the Question, I believe the hon. Gentleman is in error in speaking of the duty on fire and life policies as if it was the same on both. There is a considerable difference between them. There is a fixed duty in the case of fire policies, and a sliding scale in the case of life policies. As to an assimilation of the marine insurance duty to the fire insurance duty, the question is really one of revenue, to which I am not prepared to give any answer.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS.—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked the President of the Board of Trade, How many of the 550 vessels surveyed by the Board of Trade between 5th August 1873 and 30th June 1875, for alleged defects, and that 515 were found unseaworthy, were stopped for the placing of their lamps, and matters not imperilling life and property; and if he will consider the desirability of classifying similar future Returns, say into coasting and foreign, causes endangering life, &c. directly, such as overloading and radical defects, and minor causes, such as crew accommodation, ventilation, placing lamps, &c.?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: All the 550 ships which appear in the Return as detained were alleged to be unseaworthy. Though some may have been first detained for defective lights, &c., they would not appear on the Return unless there were also allegations of unseaworthiness imperilling life or property. The Returns are monthly, in two tables, one showing the number of ships detained for defective hull or equipments, the other for alleged overloading—none for minor causes. The classification may perhaps be somewhat improved in the way suggested by separating coasters from foreign-going ships.

MINES INSPECTORS REPORTS FOR 1875.
QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

When the collective Reports of the Inspectors of Mines for the year 1875 may be expected to be laid upon the Table of the House; and, whether he will direct that such Reports, if not ready now for printing, be prepared without delay?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, there were a great number of Returns which must be made to the Inspectors of Mines, and those Returns had not, under the Act, to be sent in till the 1st of February. It then took a considerable time for the Inspectors to put them in proper form; and the 31st of March was always held to be the earliest day on which the Reports could practically be finished. He would give special directions that they should be presented to him on or before that day.

SASINE OFFICE (EDINBURGH).

QUESTION.

MR. MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been directed to the Sasine Office in Edinburgh, and that the fees exacted during last year exceeded the expenses over fifty per cent; and, whether he will not relieve owners of property in Scotland by ordering a great reduction in the scale of fees charged in the above office?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: My attention has been directed for a considerable time to the arrangements in the Sasine Office in Edinburgh, and the departments connected with that office, including that of the searches of incumbrances affecting property. I have also had numerous representations made to me in regard to the inadequacy of the staff in these departments, and the necessity of their being increased, so as to secure greater despatch in the transaction of the business coming before them. In consequence of the representations which have been made by me, and by the officials connected with these departments, the Treasury has deemed it necessary to order a considerable increase of staff, and consequently of expenditure, with a view to meet the public convenience in regard to greater expedition in obtaining searches, and making the indices of sasines available in the provincial districts, in terms of the Act of 1868. Fully to secure these objects may probably to some extent make further demands on the Treasury; but I am glad to say that the administration of the Register of Sasines under the Act of 1868 has worked so satisfactorily that I have no doubt there will be a considerable surplus after making allowance for such expenditure, although I am not prepared to admit that the surplus is of the amount indicated in the Question. After the present and immediate demands upon it have been ascertained, the Treasury will take into consideration whether and to what extent there ought to be a reduction of fees for registration and searches, as provided for in the Act of 1868.

NAVY—NAVIGATING OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If, seeing that employment for the navigating officers in the Navy has been made more scarce by the Order which allows the Service officers to qualify for navigating duties, he will issue a reciprocal Order allowing navigating officers to qualify for general service duties; or in what other way he proposes to compensate the navigating officers for the disadvantages which a change, otherwise advantageous to the public service, has imposed on them?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the hon. Member had put to him an argumentative Question which that was not the proper occasion to deal with; but he did not admit that navigating officers were prejudiced by the Order referred to. What he proposed to do with respect to qualifying for general service was to transfer navigating midshipmen to the executive list if they desired it, either in their present rank or on passing the examination for sub-lieutenant.

INDIA—THE BOMBAY NATIVE ARMY.

QUESTION.

MR. PARNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any objection to lay before the House the Papers relating to the recent dismissal from the service by His Excellency Sir Charles Stavelo, Commander in Chief of the Bombay Army, of a Subadar of the 25th Bombay Native

Infantry on the charge of disloyal concealment of insurrectional circulars addressed to the Mahratta soldiers in the Bombay Native Army; and, whether it has been deemed expedient as yet to arm the Bombay Native Army with breechloading weapons; and, if so, to what extent the change has been carried out?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No Papers have been received at the India Office in reference to the dismissal of this Native Officer of the Bombay Native Infantry, and if we had received them, I question if it would be for the advantage of the public service to publish them. The finding of the Court Martial which tried him is to be seen in the published General Orders of the Bombay Army, dated the 31st of December last. It has been deemed expedient to arm the Bombay Native Army with breechloaders, 11 regiments having this weapon, a number which will be increased during the ensuing year.

NAVY—OFFICERS OF ROYAL MARINES. QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend during this Session to take any steps to mitigate or remove the exceptional disadvantages under which Officers of the Royal Marine Corps are placed, especially as respects stagnation of promotion, and the comparatively inadequate pay of the Colonels Second Commandant of Royal Marine Light Infantry?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, he had stated last Session that he was precluded from improving the position of officers of the Royal Marines until the Report of the Royal Commission on Promotion and Retirement in the Army was received. That Report had not yet been presented, and he did not know when it would be; but until it was presented he could not give any definite answer to the Question.

WEST AFRICAN SETTLEMENTS— CESSION OF THE GAMBIA.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is his intention to state to the House the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to the cession of the Gambia to France; and, if so, when such statement will be made?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, he was not in a position yet to name the Committee which it was proposed to appoint.

CROSSED CHEQUES.—QUESTION.

In reply to Sir JOHN LUBBOCK,

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, that his Bill was chiefly intended to restrain facilities for theft; but if it was thought that on account of its importance to the customers of banks there should be some delay, he would postpone the second reading until Thursday the 2nd of March.

ITALY—MURDER OF MR. HIND, NEAR NAPLES.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are taking steps to protect the interests of justice in the appeal to a higher tribunal, of the man who was found guilty of the murder of Mr. Hind at Naples?

MR. BOURKE: Her Majesty's Government have taken steps to secure the services of the eminent Italian counsel who was engaged on behalf of the family of the late Mr. Hind, at the original trial, for the appeal which is shortly to come on.

THE SUEZ CANAL—CONVENTION AS TO DUES.—QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I beg to give Notice that on Thursday I will ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true as announced in the public papers this morning, that Colonel Stokes and M. de Lesseps have signed a document relating to the modification of the Suez Canal duties, and whether that modification has been approved of by the Khedive, the Porte, and the maritime Powers; and, whether the right hon. Gentleman will postpone the Report on the resolution of last night until the House shall have some information upon the subject before it?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I can hardly see any reason for postponing it. There will be other proceedings of course in connection with this matter, by the introduction of a Bill and so on, which will give plenty of opportunities for discussing the question.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : Do you intend to take the Report of the Resolution to-night ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Yes.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : It is hardly usual to take the Report of such an important Resolution at a late hour. After what hour will it not be taken ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : I would rather wait until a little later in the evening before I say ; but, of course, I should not press anything on against the wishes of the House. I however hope that I shall be allowed to take the Report of this Resolution, which follows upon the acceptance of the Vote. It will afterwards be necessary to consider the question of Ways and Means, and then there will be the introduction of a Bill which will have to pass through its various stages, so that there will be plenty of opportunity for discussing the matter. Besides, there are reasons which make it very desirable that time should not be lost ; and therefore I propose to take the Report this evening, and I can hardly imagine that there will be any inconvenience arising from that course.

RECEPTION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES— THE CIRCULARS.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. WHITBREAD, in rising to move—

"1. That, in the opinion of this House, a Slave once admitted to the protection of the British Flag should be treated while on board one of Her Majesty's ships as if he were free, and should not be removed from or ordered to leave the ship on the ground of slavery. 2. That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly praying Her Majesty that all Circulars, Instructions, or Orders heretofore issued contravening the foregoing Resolution, or limiting the discretion of commanding officers in respect of the reception of such persons on board Her Majesty's ships, shall be withdrawn."

said, it was not difficult for him to find a justification for bringing this matter before the House ; because the feeling which had manifested itself throughout the country during the Autumn must have made it clear to Members of this House that it was necessary that this subject should be brought forward. If the Circular which was now in force had stood alone, it might have been sufficient to call attention to those provisions which seemed to be faulty, and to ask either for the withdrawal of the whole Circular or for an alteration of its terms. But that Circular did not stand alone. It was preceded by the Circular of July, and that in its turn had been preceded by Orders and Instructions from different Governments, extending over a long period of time. Many of these Orders and Instructions were open to great objection, and he thought the time had come when it was necessary for Parliament to interfere and lay down some line of policy which the country was ready to adopt. He had no desire to arrogate to his own side of the House any monopoly of humane feelings in dealing with this question. He was quite willing to acknowledge what Lord Carnarvon had done on the West Coast of Africa ; and he had observed with gratitude that the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had recently laid upon the Table a Supplementary Treaty, which had effected a marked improvement in the Zanzibar Treaty. He wished to credit hon. Gentlemen opposite with the same feelings in this matter which actuated his own side of the House and the whole country. This, however, did not deprive him of his right to criticize the Slave Circular where he thought it faulty ; and it was not because other Governments had fallen into errors of a similar character that Parliament should not interfere. It was, indeed, all the more reason why Parliament should express a clear and definite opinion upon the whole question ; and because both sides of the House had fallen into error it might make it easier for the Government to retreat from an untenable position. He held it to be no part of his duty to take up the scales and endeavour to mete out the portion of blame which each Government should bear. He regretted that he should have, to a certain extent, to reflect upon the conduct of statesmen who were no longer present to vindicate themselves, or to explain their reasons for acting as they did ; but he would ask the House to bear this in mind, that we should perhaps err if we took the circumstances of the present day as a guide in estimating the circumstances under which they acted long ago. Two distinctions had to be kept in view in dealing with this question—first, the distinction between slaves received on board one of Her Majesty's ships on the high seas and those received on board in the territorial waters of a foreign slave-owning Power; and, next, that the reception on board of a slave was one thing, whilst the treatment and disposal of him afterwards was quite another thing. As to the reception of slaves on board Her Majesty's ships on the high seas the law was clear and undoubted. He did not know whether there ever was any doubt cast upon it—certainly not in modern times—until the issue of the Circular of July, and that having been withdrawn as admittedly erroneous he need say no more about it. To his mind it could not be maintained that, under International Law, there was any obligation on our part to abstain from receiving on board Her Majesty's ships on the high seas any persons we thought fit. The course to be pursued in territorial waters of a foreign slave-owning Power was the point on which the greatest difficulty would be felt. In this case the best opinion appeared to be that the extrajurisdictionality of a public ship-of-war entering into such territorial waters without express prohibition was complete; at all events, so far that foreign jurisdiction was not admitted on board. In other words, a British ship-of-war entering such waters was to be regarded as forming part of these Islands, and was subject, and all on board of her, to British law alone, was, as we should say, under the municipal law only, although the foreign law prevailed round about it. There was, however, an implied understanding that those on board vessels entering into the territorial waters of a foreign Power were not wilfully to do anything hostile to the local law. He had stated broadly the principles of International Law applicable to this subject. But the question was not one of law alone; it was much more one of policy. Not having had the training of a lawyer, he would not have come forward to argue it if it had been a mere question of law, but upon a question of policy he was entitled to form an opinion; and, indeed, as a Member of that House he had undertaken a direct commission to urge that policy which he thought best; and having accepted that commission he had accepted a responsibility which he could not in a case like this throw off upon others, but must discharge in his own person according to the best judgment he could form. Upon the ground of policy he would postulate this—that it was their clear duty, as a free and freedom-loving people, in dealing with this question of slavery, not only to be well satisfied in their own minds, but also to make it clear to the whole world, that to the very extreme verge that their obligations to other States would allow, their policy leaned towards the side of freedom. That was the touchstone which should be applied to any argument or act affecting this matter—Did it, or did it not, lean towards the side of freedom? Now, he would ask the House to look for a moment to the last carefully prepared Circular. It said—

“Any person professing or appearing to be a fugitive slave seeking admission to a ship belonging to Her Majesty on the high seas, the commander must bear in mind that, although Her Majesty's Government were desirous of mitigating slavery, yet Her Majesty's ships were not intended for the reception of persons other than their officers and crew.”

This caution would seem to anybody who ever had any acquaintance with the way in which Her Majesty's ships were commanded, and the discipline which was maintained on board, a little superfluous; because they were not so roomy or commodious, not so abundantly provided with spare room, that either officers or crews would be extremely desirous of welcoming a large crowd of strangers on board. But the caution was confined to the case of slaves: there was no caution not to admit slave-owners or refugees of any kind but slaves. The Circular said—“Any person professing or appearing to be a fugitive slave.” How was the officer, before admitting a man on board, to ascertain that he was a slave? How was he to know that? The hand of the landsman was apparent all through this Circular. The drawer of it apparently had an idea that the fugitive slave seeking protection came in by the door. The sort of way in which a slave usually claimed the protection of a British ship was by swimming to her; and coming in that way, they were to ask him who he was and so on. He (Mr. Whitbread) had seen a great many negroes—free and slave—in the water; and he declared that he could not form the slightest opinion from seeing a negro in the water whether he was a free man or a slave. Yet the naval officer was told that when a man came swimming to his ship he must make up his mind whether he was a slave before admitting him on board. The dialects spoken by the negroes differed very much, and many of them could not be understood without the aid of an interpreter; so that, according to this Circular, the captain would have to call in an interpreter to question this man while he was in the water as to who was his father and mother, and as to whether he professed to be a fugitive slave. He would ask whether the fact of a man thus seeking the protection of the British flag would not to most minds be prima facie evidence that there was good reason for receiving him on board? "Not so," said the framers of the Circular; "you must first satisfy yourself before you receive the man on board that there is some sufficient reason for thus receiving him." Now, he did not think that this language, even if he admitted the law or the policy to be right, would sound in the ear of impartial judges as leaning towards freedom. The next paragraph in the Circular to which he desired to draw attention said to the commander of a British ship of war—

"Within the territorial waters of a foreign State you are bound by the comity of nations, while maintaining the proper exemption of your ship from local jurisdiction, not to allow her to become a shelter for those who would be chargeable with a violation of the law of the place. If, therefore, while your ship is within the territorial waters of a State where slavery exists, a person professing or appearing to be a fugitive slave seeks admission into your ship, you will not admit him unless his life would be in manifest danger if he were not received on board. Should you in order to save him from this danger receive him, you ought not after the danger is past to permit him to continue on board; but you will not entertain any demand for his surrender, or enter into any examination as to his status."

As to "not entertaining any demand for his surrender," that was superfluous, because the slave was to be surrendered almost before any demand could possibly be made for him; and as to not entering "into any examination as to his status," he doubted whether the naval officer would understand what that meant. If wise, he would put but few questions to the slave, for fear he might be asking about the forbidden thing. The commander was told to "maintain the proper exemption of his ship from local jurisdiction," and that was immediately interpreted to mean that he should assist in enforcing on board his own vessel the local law of slavery. Let the House listen how all the strong words and all the hard words told against the slave. "You are bound by the comity of nations" not to shelter him. You will not admit him unless his life is in "manifest danger." "Should you" receive him after all this caution, then immediately the direct command—"you ought not to permit him to remain on board," he is to be given up. Let them observe how all the words told against the slave, and that the Circular was directed against the slave alone, and against the refugee of no other nation—only against the slave. He asked, did this lean towards the side of freedom? or, on the contrary, did not the whole of this paragraph weigh as heavily as language could weigh against the chances of the slave being taken on board? What it said, in fact, was this—"It is only when the slave's life is in imminent danger you are to take him on board; then be slow to receive him, and be quick to give him up." He might be asked at what his Resolution pointed, and whether he desired that our ships should be cities of refuge for every slave who desired to get on board, whether he were criminal or not. He said, certainly not; that he desired nothing of the kind. He knew very well that it was of the first necessity that a captain should have complete control over his ship, particularly as to who he admitted into it. The objection he had to the document was, that it was only levelled at the slave and not at the free man. He should like to say here that, as to holding out our ships as mere refuges for slaves, he did not think it the right way for this country to deal with the question of domestic slavery. If domestic slavery was to be approached it should be by some open, avowed, and recognized manner. It would not, he thought, be a dignified course for a great country to pursue to attempt to deal with it by merely taking a few slaves here and there from the grasp of slavery and transporting them to another place, for the result would be only to embitter the lives of those who remained behind, and probably seriously to hamper us in dealing with the question of the Slave Trade.

Whenever the question of domestic slavery was approached—and approached it must be at a day not so far distant as some might suppose—he could not help thinking there were forces already at work which before long must break down that institution—it must be dealt with by an attack on the institution itself. As to the reception of slaves, all he desired was that we should revert to the practice which prevailed before the two Circulars were issued, of leaving to our officers the discretion of receiving on board their ships under their protection a slave, if they were of opinion that there were special circumstances in the case which justified them in taking that course. Let him for a moment ask the House to consider what would be the probable working of the Circular to which he wished to call their particular attention. What was the plain English of the words “not permit him to remain on board?” They could not mean that when the slave was on board one of our ships the commanding officer should go up to him and say—“Mind, I have not given you permission to be here,” and yet take no steps to remove him. He was sure his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty would not construe the language of the Circular in that manner, and tell him not to permit a slave to remain on board, but to take steps to remove him. It was misleading language, and did not in that respect compare well with the July document for which every one had a bad word, but in favour of which he was glad to be able to say at least this. Whoever drew that Circular knew his mind and spoke it frankly; but his law was bad. It was admitted to be so; but it had the advantage of speaking in clear language. It said that the slave was to be surrendered; and that was the meaning of “not permitting him to remain on board.” No other construction could be put upon those words. But in the first Circular there was one crumb of comfort for the poor slave, put in, he believed, at the instance of the Admiralty, and that was, that when he was about to be surrendered the commanding officer should try to make favourable terms for him; even this was omitted from the second Circular. It was a hard and dry document, made as severe against the slave as language could possibly make it. It seemed to him that whoever had drawn up that Circular must have felt the indignation with which the first had been regarded by the English public, and must have argued with himself that “surrender” was an ugly word, of which it was desirable to get rid. So he employed instead language which he thought he was not describing unfairly when he characterized it as an attempt to say to the British public—“We do not surrender the slave,” and to the slaveowner, “We do not keep him”—language with which he supposed the latter was very well satisfied. Let the House picture to itself a slave taken on board one of Her Majesty’s ships after a long swim for his life and in a state of exhaustion. The risk to his life being over, the captain might say to the poor man—“You can be permitted to stop here no longer;” and where, then, was he to go? On the shore there were the slaveowner and his assistants, while in the bay there were the sharks in waiting for him. Well, the Circular which was drawn for the assistance of our officers spoke of “when the danger is past;” but was it so easy for them to decide when that was the case? Let him put a case by way of illustration. Suppose a slave came on board a ship after a hot pursuit, the commanding officer might, perhaps, acting on the humane suggestion contained in the first Circular, go on shore and ask the slaveowner if he was still angry with his fugitive slave, and whether he would spare him if he returned. The slaveowner replies—“I was very angry, but I have cooled down; he is a good slave, and if he comes back I will forgive him.” The captain goes back to the slave and says—“Your master will forgive you, the danger to your life is past, my orders are imperative, and you must be put ashore.” But suppose the slave were to turn round and say—“Do you know what my offence was? I was speaking to some of my fellow-slaves on their condition, and upon our hopes of setting ourselves free. We heard that your country had set at liberty a vast number of our race on the other side of the Continent, and that many others who in a distant country were set free within the last few years are now producing more as free labourers than they ever produced as slaves. We wish no harm to our master, but we desire to have our liberty too; but this is just the sort of thing which my master cannot bear, and to hear me speaking in that way would drive him into an ungovernable passion. He caught me doing so some time ago, and punished me severely; you may see the marks. He threatened that if I were to do so again he would use me still worse, and you can judge whether he is likely to carry out his threat or not. If I go back, something tells me I must again speak to my fellows in the same way, and I shall have to bear the consequences." Would not the officer at once see in in the poor slave before him one in whom the undying flame had been lit—the true passionate yearning for freedom which once kindled could hardly be kept under, and, he thanked God, could never be quite extinguished. But the Circular was imperative. The danger being past, the man must be sent back, now if that man stood true to his convictions, and for them met his death—it would have an ugly appearance when the story came to be known in this country, and would prevent one from wishing to be too closely connected with the department which had approved the transaction. But it might be said that, under such circumstances as he had just mentioned, where there was a certainty of the slave being punished, the commanding officer would be justified in detaining him. If, however, the man was not sent back, what became of the good understanding which it was sought to establish with the slaveowner, whom the Government were so anxious to conciliate? He would remind us of our bond, and would insist that, in accordance with it, his slave should be restored to him when the moment of danger was past; and he would have good ground for urging his claim under the circumstances. But it might be answered that the point was one which was not likely to arise, that the African slaves were too degraded, and that such a person as he had just sketched did not exist among them. Now, he at once admitted that persons of that character were very rare among the slave population. Otherwise the House would not now be discussing this question, for slavery would long ago have been abolished. But the country could not go on dealing with Africa as we were now doing, buying here, colonizing there, freeing slaves by thousands, and planting them in States to work for themselves, driving roads through Africa everywhere for the spread of commerce and for the purpose of scientific investigation, even for sport, and expect that doing this, and teaching the Natives the use of our weapons and also a knowledge of our language, the last thing they would learn would be some of our ideas of personal freedom. It was clear the question was one which might arise any day, and we should then find it, he thought, somewhat difficult to draw a distinction between the punishment of slaves for that class of offences and political refugees. He wondered who asked to have this document drawn for his assistance. There was, he might add, a most instructive Return, which had been moved for by the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms), and which he held in his hand, of all the cases in which during the last 10 years British officers on foreign stations had asked for instructions with regard to slaves, and it appeared that Sir Leopold Heath was the only one who had done so during that time. He wished to know who really asked for the Circular. [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: Lord Northbrook.] He (Mr. Whitbread) did not think it was Lord Northbrook who asked for a General Slave Circular, but that it was the lawyers, because they disliked being repeatedly asked their opinion upon cases as they arose, and therefore it was said it would be better to make an order of general application and get rid of questions being put to them. The Circular was said to be for the guidance of our officers; but it would really place them in an embarrassing position. Had those who drew the Circular ever considered how hard it was upon a British officer going out upon an errand of which heretofore anyone might have been proud, but now with this Admiralty Circular on his table, dreading above all things lest an appeal from some helpless slave should be made to him—having no choice but strictly to obey his orders—yet knowing that the very act which, in obedience to his orders, he had to do, would be looked upon with indignation by his countrymen. As regarded the reception of slaves on board Her Majesty's ships, there was only one practicable rule. It ought to be left to the discretion of the officer in command to deal with each case on the spot, knowing all the circumstances; he did not think it possible for all the Law Officers of the Crown or for a Royal Commission to draw up a Circular on the reception of slaves that would stand, for two reasons. First it was impossible to draw up a general Circular applicable to the conditions of slavery in different quarters of the globe, because the whole circumstances of slavery differed widely in different quarters; secondly, if the Circular embraced every case which ought to be received, there might as well be no Circular at all. If it excluded cases which ought to be received, the public opinion of the country would not tolerate it. He wanted to know upon what grounds this country could be required to take, on board our own ships, any steps that would directly recognize or aid in the maintenance of slavery? The Resolutions which he had the honour of moving aimed at treating fugitive slaves on board Her Majesty's ships according to the law of England, and if others thought that some different law ought to prevail on board our ships it was for them to make out their case, and not for him to make out his. In dealing with the question, whether our law on this question ought to prevail as against the local law, some consideration must be had for the object for which our ships were sent out, which was the suppression of the Slave Trade; and England in endeavouring to suppress the Slave Trade felt that if the trade was suppressed, the institution of slavery was at an end. Yet it was contended that on board our own ships, sent abroad with this very object, we ought to recognize that which the law of England had repeatedly refused to recognize in any way. He could quite understand that courtesy to foreign Powers might make us use very great caution and discretion in the reception of persons on board our vessels; but when once they were on board, without any fault on our part, if there were any meaning in the word extraterritoriality—if there was any meaning in the phrase that a British ship in territorial waters was under the Municipal law—the law of England—he failed to see how it could possibly be contended that we were to administer on board our ships any fraction of the law of slavery. He did not believe such an obligation existed; but preferred to believe the dictum of Mr. Justice Holroyd, who, in the famous case of "Forbes v. Cockrane," tried in 1822, relating to certain slaves who had escaped from Florida on board a British ship, said of the slave—

"He ceases to be a slave in England only because there is no law which sanctions his detention in slavery; for the same reason he would cease to be a slave the moment he landed on the supposed newly discovered island. In this case, indeed, the fugitives did not escape to any island belonging to England, but they went on board an English ship—which for this purpose may be considered a floating island—and in that ship they became subject to the English laws alone. They then stood in the same situation in this respect as if they had come to an island colonized by the English. It was not a wrongful act in the defendants to receive them; quite the contrary. The moment they got on board the English ship, there was an end of any right which the plaintiff had by the Spanish laws acquired over them as slaves. They had got beyond the control of their master, and beyond the territory where the law recognizing them as slaves prevailed; they were under the protection of another power."

What he wanted to know was, whether it would be a wrongful act on the part of an officer commanding a ship of war to receive a slave on board. He maintained that the officer certainly had a right to receive the slave, and why, then, should we actively take steps to have the fugitive delivered up? What power had we to order officers to remove a fugitive from a vessel on the ground that he was a slave? Supposing the slave were to resist, the possible legal consequences to our officers ought to be taken into consideration. Again, supposing that a slave were to be taken on board because he was in danger in consequence of an emeute, what would his position on board be while the danger lasted? He must be either a slave or a free man; and it could hardly be maintained that he could be enfranchised one day and enslaved again the next. If they felt bound to give him up as a slave, what was he in the meantime? But if they detained him, so as to give him up, what law authorized it? Or might the slave escape from the British ship to some other vessel—thus using his stay on board the British ship merely as a means to baffle the pursuit? It would be a very undignified position, in order to get out of the difficulty, to let the man escape. If a man was not to be free as soon as he got under the British flag, when was he to be so? Was he to wait until he touched English soil? If so, they must give up the decision in the great case of Forbes v. Cochrane; but perhaps it would be said that he was free only when the ship got out of territorial waters and was on the high seas. Then see the absurdity of the position if a slave happened to be taken on board just as the ship was leaving her anchorage for a short run out to sea of say a few hours duration, returning to her anchorage in the territorial waters in the evening. None of these regulations applied to the reception of the refugees of every nation. If the right of granting free asylums was to be maintained, he submitted that we could not adjust them to the colours of men, and say to the white man that he was free, but as the skin grew darker the protection was gradually lessened, until when they reached the jet black it vanished altogether. It might be urged that we should consult with foreign Powers and try to modify the international rules which applied to this question. But we did not want a Royal Commission to help us in communicating with foreign Powers. Parliament had been told in the Queen's Speech that our relations with foreign Powers were of the most cordial kind. Let the Government, then, make use of these cordial relations with foreign Powers and earn the gratitude of the human race by taking a step forward in this question. At any rate, if they were going to consult foreign Powers, it became doubly necessary for Parliament to interpose and put an end to the doubts cast by the July and the more recent Circular as to the mind of the English people, by laying down some clear line of demarcation beyond which this country was not prepared to go in the direction of expediency, and by which it was determined to abide upon the ground of principle. Perhaps the Government were so fast bound in the toils of their Law Officers that they could not stir hand or foot. In that case he must appeal to independent Members on both sides of the House. In criticizing the Circulars issued by the present Government he had not referred specifically to the instructions and orders of former Governments, for the simple reason that the last Circular was that more immediately before the House, and was the latest exposition of the views of the Government. In drawing the Motion, too, and in what he had said, he had endeavoured not needlessly to impart any Party bitterness to this question. At times of national danger independent Members on both sides must rally round the Government. But when any great principle, cherished by the country, was threatened it became the duty of independent Members to intimate to the Government that their policy was not approved. On this question the House of Commons had never been consulted. The Prime Minister had said that he did not like secret instructions on this subject, and he had good reason for saying so, if they had been open the Government would never have been put into the position of having to acknowledge their mistake, or, what was still worse, of having to defend it, for the opinion of the country would have been given as unequivocally at any former period within the last 40 years as it had been given on the present occasion. Now that the question had been raised, the House of Commons could not shirk its responsibility. It was bad when a Department made a mistake; it was bad when the Government followed the action of the Department; but what would be said if the House of Commons, speaking for the British nation, declared that it had not made up its mind and failed to set matters right? Were we to tell the whole world that, though during all these years our cruisers had been on foreign coasts trying to suppress the slave trade, we could not now make up our minds as to the position of a slave taken on board one of Her Majesty's ships? If this House did not know its mind, it stood well-nigh alone on this question; for there was not a town or county in which the vast majority, present at any fair and open meeting, would not at once see through the web of technicalities with which some had endeavoured to surround the question and pronounce for a clear and decided line of policy. Perhaps it would be said that this was a question which constituencies did not understand — this was a lawyer's question. Well, once before the House had received a stinging rebuke from the Law Courts about slavery. Speaking in 1822, Chief Justice Best said—

"It is matter of pride to me to recollect that, whilst economists and politicians were recommending to the legislature the protection of this traffic, and senators were framing statutes for its promotion, and declaring it a benefit to the country, the judges of the land, above the age in which they lived, standing upon the high ground of natural rights, and disdaining to bend to the lower doctrine of expediency, declared that slavery was inconsistent with the genius of the English constitution, and that human beings could not be the subject matter of property. As a lawyer, I speak of that early determination, when a different doctrine was prevailing in the senate, with a considerable degree of professional pride."

He might well be proud of that determination. The House should remember, then, that another tribunal might possibly be called upon to decide this question, and to lay down the law. Did the House desire to wait for another rebuke from the Law Courts, all the more biting and severe because these judgments had been for 50 years before their eyes, and they had failed to read them? Did the House desire to wait till they were again told that they were unworthy guardians of the great principle of freedom for the slave upon British soil? Or did they mean to wait until a worse thing happened—when England halting found herself left behind in the race and the slave learned to feel himself safer under another flag? England in the past had made this question her own; but there was now another people on whom similar motives might operate, and who might vie with us in this race. He thanked the House for the attention with which they had listened to him. The marked silence with which his remarks had been received by the other side of the House would fain make him believe that in opinion at all events they were not far apart. At any rate, for himself, feeling well assured that he was asking nothing contrary to the principles of International Law, rightly understood—feeling confident, too, that he was only giving expression to convictions so deep and widespread that they might be truly called part of the faith of the nation—he earnestly invited the House, in the terms of the Resolution which stood in his name, firmly, clearly, and once for all to claim for England that she did not allow herself to be under any bond to recognize, aid, or enforce on board the Queen's ships, be they where they might, the hateful law of slavery. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolutions.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, a Slave once admitted to the protection of the British Flag should be treated while on board one of Her Majesty's ships as if he were free, and should not be removed from or ordered to leave the ship on the ground of slavery."—(Mr. Whitbread.)

MR. HANBURY in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That, in the opinion of this House, and in order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it is desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission, both as to the instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers, the international obligations of this Country, and the attitude of other States in regard to the treatment of domestic Slaves on board of national ships"— said, he thought it was a subject for congratulation that the Motion had fallen into the hands of one so sure to treat it in a spirit of moderation as the hon. Member for Bedford. The question raised by the Motion was one in which both sides of the House had an equal interest. The slavery policy of this country and the maintenance of its maritime rights were each of them a national inheritance, with which no Government, whether Liberal or Conservative, would be allowed to tamper; and any Government attempting such a course would richly deserve the condemnation of the country. In dealing with this question of slavery, however, we must recollect that we were not the only people concerned, and that the subject was one which involved very delicate and difficult matters of International Law, which could not be determined by generous impulse alone—certainly not by generous impulse fortified by a strong admixture of Party animus. Whatever might be the view entertained outside, within the House, at all events, they were bound to pass from irresponsible declamation to a consideration of the bare facts of the case. Hatred of slavery was not the monopoly of any one party or class, and the question they had to consider was, not what we wished to do, for on that point there was no sort of doubt, but what we could do legally and of right. The law or comity which regulated the intercourse of nations was too delicate an instrument to handle rudely or hastily, and in dealing with it without due deliberation we might find that we were setting precedents in the case of small and weak States which might hereafter be used against ourselves by the great and strong. If there was one country in the world which must necessarily have a respect for International Law it must be an insular nation like ourselves, with a world-wide commerce and many distant dependencies; and the one question therefore now was whether, if we intended to be regulated in our actions by the Law of Nations, as he presumed we did, we could do that which the Motion asked us to do? There were two sets of circumstances in which we had to deal with slaves. Turning first to the case of slaves on board our ships on the high seas, he must premise that he had not risen to defend the terms of the first Circular—whether anyone would attempt to defend it he did not know—but that Circular had been withdrawn by Her Majesty's Government, it had been explained and apologized for, and it was now dead and buried; and he should be surprised if any hon. Member played the part of a vulture and raked it up out of its grave—because, should he do so, the country would not thank him for his trouble. What they had to do was to endeavour to benefit the slave, not to make political capital out of him. That being the case, he did not think there could be much objection to the second Circular, as far as it dealt with the case of slaves on board our ships on the high seas, in which case they were not to be surrendered to their owners, but were, on the contrary, to be cared for and landed in a place of security. If we were to go further than this, we should have the English Fleet turned into a refuge for criminals. The real difficulty arose with reference to the Queen's ships in the territorial waters of other Powers. Nobody denied that the captain of a ship had jurisdiction over his own crew in territorial waters; but the question was, whether he had jurisdiction over the subjects of a foreign State who might come on board his ship? If they had no jurisdiction, everyone who came on board, be he slave or political refugee, must be given up; if he had this right, everybody would be only too glad that he should be able to receive such refugees on board his ship. What was the law on this subject that had been laid down by Chief Justice Best in the case of "Forbes v. Cochrane," to which the hon. Member had referred? That learned Judge had said, referring to certain slaves on board an English ship—

"The moment they put their feet on board of a British man-of-war not lying within the waters of East Florida—there undoubtedly the laws of that country would prevail—those persons who before had been slaves were free."

He was surprised that the hon. Member should have referred to a case that told so strongly against him as that did. In drawing up their Circular the Government were fettered not only with legal precedents such as this, but by the practice of preceding Liberal Governments, because in every case in which a slave had been ordered to be given up, that order had been given by some one of the party now sitting on the opposite benches. The opinions of Lord Palmerston, who took the greatest interest in this question, and knew more about it than anyone else, were well known, and they were expressed in reference to the case that occurred in 1837 of a slave who had secreted himself on board Her Majesty's ship Romney in the harbour of Havana. The commander of that vessel, Lieutenant Jenkin, delivered the slave over to the authorities at Havana, and Lord Palmerston, on the 5th of January, 1838, in his official communication on the subject said—

"With reference to your despatch of the 10th October, containing your correspondence with Lieutenant Jenkin, commanding the Romney hulk, relative to a negro who had secreted himself on board that vessel, and whom Lieutenant Jenkin had given up to the local authorities, I have to acquaint you that the course pursued by Lieutenant Jenkin in this case appears to me to have been right and proper."

And not only did Lord Palmerston express that opinion, but he communicated with the British Ambassador at Madrid, and directed him to give official notice to the Spanish Government of his approval of what had been done. Passing over many other precedents, he came to what had occurred in 1870, when a most important despatch was sent by Mr. Hammond—now Lord Hammond—to the Secretary of the Admiralty, under the direction of Lord Clarendon. That despatch was as follows:—

"I am directed by the Earl of Clarendon to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th ultimo, inclosing a letter from the Commander of Her Majesty's naval forces on the East Coast of Africa, relative to the complaints preferred against the Commanders of Her Majesty's ships Nymph and Dryad, by the Hova authorities, with regard to their proceedings in carrying off and then liberating certain domestic slaves at Majunga, who swam off to those vessels to escape from their masters, and in destroying certain slave dhows at the same port, and I am to state to you in reply, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, that Lord Clarendon conceives that the Commanders of Her Majesty's ships Nymph and Dryad were not justified in sailing away with the slaves in question in the manner above set forth. The status of slavery being acknowledged and lawful in Madagascar, the commander of a British ship-of-war is not borne out in depriving the inhabitants of slaves who are rightfully their property, and the owners of such slaves are plainly entitled to compensation from us for the losses incurred at our hands by their abduction. If a British cruiser were at sea beyond the territorial jurisdiction of Madagascar, and slaves on shore were to seize a boat to escape to the British ship, the case would be different, and we might then fairly decline to surrender persons received on board under such circumstances: it is, however, impossible to approve the conduct of Her Majesty's officers in cases like the present, the facts of which simply amount to the entry into the waters of a friendly Power of a British ship, and to her depriving the subjects of that Power of their lawful property. Such a course can, moreover, have no other effect than to indispose the natives and authorities towards us, and would in all probability tend to prevent their carrying out their engagements for the suppression of the Slave Trade."

It subsequently turned out that the persons carried away by the Dryad were free men. But Lord Clarendon, in a subsequent despatch, said—

"I was not aware that it could be proved that any of the escaped slaves had been imported into Madagascar in violation of the Treaty, which would doubtless give them a claim to British protection; but I am of opinion that the commanders of Her Majesty's cruisers are not justified, where slavery is legal, in receiving fugitive domestic slaves on board their vessels, or in carrying them away in spite of the local authorities."

In 1871 the following instructions appeared in the East Indian Station Orders:—

"Art. 147. Her Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs has decided that slaves coming on board ships-of-war within the territorial jurisdiction of the country from which they escape, that is to say, within three miles of the shore, should be returned to the owners; but when it appears that slaves coming on board Her Majesty's ships have been recently imported in violation of Treaties, the commanders of Her Majesty's ships should communicate the facts to the Consul, with a view to proper inquiry being made, rather than carry off the slaves on their own responsibility.

"Art. 148. With reference to the course to be pursued in the case of slaves captured by Her Majesty's cruisers who may prove to have been kidnapped within the territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar, Her Majesty's Government is of opinion that slaves in the above category captured within the Sultan's territories or waters should, for the future, be restored to the proper authorities at Zanzibar; but that slaves captured on the high seas, or without the jurisdiction of the Sultan, ought not to be given up to the Zanzibar authorities."

The statement he had made and the documents he had quoted up to this point settled the question as far as preceding Governments were concerned, and when he was asked why the Circulars were issued, he could only say that Her Majesty's Government were tied down by the laws enacted and the precedents set by former Administrations; and if they erred at all, it had been in taking the part of the slaves and going beyond what the law actually gave them power to do by ignoring the right of any persons to hold human beings in domestic slavery. The second Circular clearly could not be withdrawn. If it were withdrawn, the Circulars issued by preceding Liberal Governments would again come into force—Circulars far more stringent and far less favourable to the slave. The hon. Member for Bedford was placed in this awkward position—either Lord Palmerston, Lord Clarendon, and those who acted with them were guilty of issuing these stringent Circulars and despatches when International Law gave them the right to harbour the domestic slave, or International Law did not give that right—in which case the Motion of the hon. Member was a direct appeal to a breach of that International Law. For his part he put more faith in Lord Palmerston than in the semi-philanthropic, semi-political meetings which had lately professed to decide the law. But the late Liberal Governments had not only hampered the present Government by their practice and by their Circulars, but they had bound the nation by a distinct promise given to the Natives, that they would not interfere with domestic slavery. Thus in 1865 was issued the following general instruction for the guidance of naval officers employed in the suppression of the Slave Trade:—

"In your intercourse with the natives you will endeavour to conciliate their good-will by kindness and forbearance, and will take care that the officers and men under your command shall do the same. You will take special care not to offend the prejudices of the natives, and you will make allowance for any jealousy or distrust with which you may be met. You will impress upon the natives the earnest desire of Great Britain for the improvement of their condition, and will clearly point out to them the distinction between the export of slaves which Great Britain is determined to put down, and the system of domestic slavery with which she does not claim to interfere."

In addition to this Lord Russell, in a despatch dated March 4, 1864, clearly laid it down that Her Majesty's Government did not claim the right to interfere with the status of domestic slaves; and later on, in 1869, a Circular of instruction was issued in which it was stated that—

"Slave trade must be carefully distinguished from slavery: with which, as existing in foreign States, or on board foreign ships, not being in British territorial waters, Her Majesty's Government does not claim, either by Treaty or otherwise, to interfere."

They were placed in this awkward dilemma—either to break the faith and solemn word of this nation, or, in order to escape from the trammels in which preceding Governments had placed them, to appoint a Royal Commission, who might deal with the question by Treaty or otherwise. He was sorry to find that Her Majesty's Government in issuing the Circulars was not only hampered by the decisions on International Law, by the Circulars, the despatches, and the promises of their Liberal Predecessors, but that in 1873 an Act was passed by the late Government, of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) was a Member, sweeping away every Act which from 1824 to 1862 had protected the slave populations of the world. The old system of Buxton and Clarkson and Wilberforce was to compensate the owners of slaves who escaped by getting on board British ships, whenever we had no Treaty on the subject with the country to which the slaveowner belonged; but under the rule of rigid economy inaugurated by the Liberal Party, philanthropy at other people's expense became the rule, and it was proposed instead of compensating slaveowners for their liberated property to deprive them of their slaves by force. Under the old policy, £20,000,000 was spent in compensation to our own subjects in the West Indies, £900,000 in compensation to Spain, £600,000 for a similar purpose to Portugal, and very nearly £1,000,000 in compensation to foreign private slave-owners. That was undoubtedly a right principle to act upon, and it was their generosity, their philanthropy, which really cost us something, which won us the admiration of the world. If that principle was carried out in reference to great States of European origin, why were their rules or opinions to be forced upon small oriental States, which stood in a much better position in regard to slavery than the former, because in Asia and Africa it was not an exotic—an unnatural growth as it was in America and the West Indies, but a native product which had existed from time immemorial, and one which had been mitigated and modified by a host of usages and long centuries of custom. That being so, he did protest most emphatically against having one rule for weak and poor States, and another for those which were rich and powerful. The power of compensation was swept away by the Act of 1873, and so were also the elaborate provisions of the Act of 1824, that secured the future welfare of the slave; and what now remained was, that the Consul who condemned the slave had power to send him to anybody he liked, failing Treasury regulations on the subject. It simply amounted to this, that, instead of the open, acknowledged policy which formerly prevailed in this country upon this subject—a policy which everybody understood—we now had a secret policy, under which slaves were to be dealt with by Treasury regulations, and nobody was to know what would be done with them. The late Government had swept away provisions supporting those slaves that were captured—not simply the few that took refuge on board our own vessels, but the thousands that were taken in the ordinary pursuit of the slave trade; and it was, at present, a national disgrace that all these slaves were maintained since 1873 by two private societies, without the expenditure of one shilling by this country. In 1870 a Committee strongly urged upon the Government that the Imperial Treasury should provide funds for the maintenance of slaves rescued by Her Majesty's agents in Zanzibar from slavery; but Lord Granville, writing to Dr. Kirk on the 17th of March, 1874, concluded his despatch as follows:—

"I have nothing to add to the instructions I sent to you on the 10th inst. I will only add that, in consequence of a recent decision of the Treasury, no additional expense can be incurred for the present, as proposed in the Report of the Committee, in increasing the staff of the Agency at Zanzibar or the naval force employed in the suppression of the slave trade on the East Coast, or in appointing consular agents along the coast to control the traffic within the limits to be regulated by treaty."

Nay, so far did matters go that, as appeared from the Report of the Commons' Committee, 1871, a proposal to divide between the Indian and Imperial Exchequer the cost of maintaining the Agency and Consulate at Zanzibar, in which the India Office concurred, "was negatived by the Treasury," the consequence of which was that—

"The Secretary of State for India in Council had informed the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that the Foreign Office would no longer be privileged to send any instructions to the Zanzibar Agent, and the whole matter, therefore, was brought to a deadlock."

In short, the Slave Trade Department of the Foreign Office was then and there abolished. He was reading the other day a biography of the noble Lord who took so intense an interest in the question of slavery—Lord Palmerston; and what did he say about the conduct of those Governments for which he could speak in respect to it? He said—

"No First Lord and no Board of Admiralty have ever felt any interest in the suppression of the Slave Trade or taken any steps of their own free will towards its accomplishment; and whatever they have done in compliance with the wishes of others, they have done grudgingly and imperfectly."

Now, there were many reasons why the House could not settle the question that night. He had shown that if the slave was to derive any benefit from their action in the matter, they were bound to restore the old policy of this country—the policy which had been swept away by a preceding Government—namely, that of compensating the slaveowner and finding a refuge for the slave. It was somewhat curious to remark the conduct of Gentlemen opposite on this question. At first there was a great outcry about the Circular; the popular feeling was worked upon, and violent denunciations were indulged in. About that time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) addressed his constituents, and what did he say in reference to this, the burning question of the day? He was expected to curse his enemies, but an honest Statesman with an uneasy conscience could not curse. The right hon. Gentleman contented himself with this remark—"The case was not so simple as was supposed." And, again, in a less guarded moment, he said—"Why publish any Circular at all?" Why not in short maintain the old Liberal policy of surrendering the fugitive slave and saying nothing about it? That was what the question of the right hon. Gentleman amounted to—and what way, he asked, would the right hon. Gentleman vote to-night? The case, as he himself admitted, was not so simple. It could not be decided off-hand, and in spite of all those difficulties of International Law which existed, and of all those obstacles which the right hon. Gentleman's own Colleagues had placed in the way. And were those who thought so little of municipal law, that when a great State was involved—when they had negotiations with the United States were ready to sacrifice our municipal law to International Law—were they going to-night, when the question only dealt with small States, to over-ride International Law and place in its stead that municipal law of which on another occasion they thought so little? If so, he could only say it was, indeed, a fortunate circumstance that slavery no longer existed in the great State to which he had referred. He thought it had been discovered by this time that a Royal Commission was no extinguisher under which Her Majesty's Government could retire from their present position. It would be found that it was absolutely necessary in order to stretch our municipal law as far as it could be stretched in favour of the slave. And what were the objections urged to the course proposed to be taken? It was said that it would tend to delay. Well, a Paper had been laid upon the Table of the House showing how many fugitive slaves had had to be dealt with during a considerable time, and it appeared that they amounted to just six in 15 years. Surely, then, there was no such necessity for great speed as hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to suppose. It was not only the case of fugitive slaves, for which Her Majesty's Government had done their best, that the Commission would have to consider, but also that of those victims of the slave trade for whom the late Government had done its worst. Again, they would have to make sure that by interfering with the status of domestic slavery they did not make the lot of the slave worse than it was before. It should be remembered, too, that when we suppressed the slave trade at sea it was carried on by land, and in a far more horrible manner than it had been at sea. The Pacific too was becoming a great highway for our commerce, and the islands of the Pacific were teeming with slavery. It would be necessary that rules should be drawn up for dealing with slavery in those waters. Then, again, within recent years the only two countries of Europe which still maintained slavery—Turkey and Egypt—had been admitted into the European brotherhood, and even if we had not a right to interfere with domestic slavery in those countries, we had a fair claim, considering the nature of our relations with those countries, to urge upon them that their flag should never cover slavery as it still did on the high seas. Turkey was spreading fast in those countries where slavery was most difficult and dangerous to deal with, so that that aspect of the question was one of growing importance. Now was the time to obtain from those Powers the right of search, and he thought they had a fair right also to ask the same right of the French Government, as there were parts of the world in which the flag of France covered the slave trade. There was another and more urgent reason why a Royal Commission should issue, and it was this—that public opinion was excited upon this question in a way in which it had not been excited for many years. This, then, was the time for the Government to act, and he had no doubt that an open policy—repudiating altogether those secret instructions which had been too long the rule—would meet with the approval of the House and the country. It was a policy which would enable the public to see what was being done, with a full appreciation of the whole case in the light which would be thrown upon it by the Commission. It was one also which would enable the Government—having the whole country at their back—to deal finally and conclusively with this important question. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it is desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission, both as to the instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers, the international obligations of this Country, and the attitude of other States in regard to the treatment of domestic Slaves on board of national ships,"—(Mr. Hanbury),—instead thereof.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's speech was not a reply to his hon. Friend, nor was it a defence of his own proposition, but rather an attack upon the late Government for having by their action fettered the present Government in this matter, and set them an example which they could not avoid following. It might appear somewhat bold for a Member of the late Government immediately to rise and say he earnestly desired to support the Motion which his hon. Friend (Mr. Whitbread) had submitted to the House. There was one part of the attack of the hon. Gentleman which he would shortly deal with in which he referred to himself (Mr. W. E. Forster) and to the Act of 1873 which repealed the former Slave Trade Acts or the greater part of them, and re-enacted them by a Consolidated Act. Had he been aware that the hon. Gentleman would refer to that Act he should have carefully read it through, and also the Acts which it replaced; but of this he was perfectly sure—that neither in the Act itself nor in the statutes which it replaced was there any provision whatever affecting the position of fugitive slaves on board Her Majesty's ships. If the hon. Gentleman thought that the Act of 1873, in dealing with the actions of our officers in putting down the slave trade placed them in a disadvantageous position as compared with the previous one, he should only be too glad that it should be fairly considered; but that was really only leading them away from the subject before them. There might be differences of opinion as to the best way of carrying out our policy of putting down the slave trade; but the question before the House now was, what the captains of British ships should do when fugitive slaves took refuge on board. The hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury) had referred to a case in 1836 in which Lord Palmerston was concerned. That was a long time ago; and if the hon. Member would refer to the first page of the Appendix it would be seen that the affair was not so clear and disparaging against Lord Palmerston as it had been attempted to make out. It occurred a very short time after our abolition of slavery, and there was reason to believe that the man referred to had been sent on board as a trap to get the commander into a difficulty, and that he was not a fugitive slave. The hon. Member had also referred to a letter written by Lord Clarendon in 1870. It might be said that he (Mr. W. E. Forster), as a Member of the Government of that day, was in a sense responsible for that letter, and so he was. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) had set the House an example in the way of accepting responsibility the other night. He told them he was responsible for the first Slave Circular, although he never saw it before it was published. The letter of Lord Clarendon's, he believed, never came before the Cabinet at all, and he did not happen to be a Member of the Cabinet at that time, and certainly never heard of this letter until the Government had issued their second Circular. Although he did not think that the letter of 1870 prevented either him or any other Gentleman who sat on that Bench from expressing his opinion on the Motion before the House, he was ready to admit this amount of responsibility with regard to it—that it put him and every other Member of the late Government in the position that they would be very much to blame if they took advantage of the Motion to turn it into a Party attack. For himself, he regretted those letters of Lord Clarendon, and wished he had closed his Correspondence on the subject of fugitive slaves in 1856. In a letter written at that date on a case that occurred in Brazil, he defined the law and policy of this country. It was a case in which the master of a merchant vessel was supposed to have taken slaves away. Lord Clarendon gave instructions that the masters of British merchant vessels should be warned of the liabilities they incurred by harbouring slaves on board their ships with a view to carry them away. He said—

“As merchant vessels are subject to the law and jurisdiction of the country in whose ports they may be, it was right that warning should be given to the masters of British vessels with regard to this matter; but it should be borne in mind that if a slave were to take refuge on board a British ship of war, it will still, as heretofore, be the duty of the captain to refuse to surrender such slave.

The case which elicited this opinion from Lord Clarendon did not occur with a weak State like Madagascar or Mozambique, but with Brazil and when the United States was still a great slave-holding Power. He was sorry that Lord Clarendon did not abide by that letter. But although he very much regretted the Correspondence to which he had referred, he was glad of it for one result. He was glad that it had the result of making it impossible that this question could be considered a Party affair. They very often said on both sides of the House that they did not think the matter in hand a Party affair; but there were old associations which would make him ashamed of himself if he were to turn any anti-slavery question into a Party matter. The Motion said—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly praying Her Majesty that all Circulars, Instructions, or Orders heretofore issued contravening the foregoing Resolution, or limiting the discretion of commanding officers in respect of the reception of such persons on board Her Majesty's ships, shall be withdrawn.”

He believed that the Station Order issued in consequence of Lord Clarendon's letter was still in force, and in so far as the Motion conveyed any censure at all, it was a censure on the preceding Government as much as the present Government. That must not be forgotten. One word with regard to the Station Order. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hanbury) seemed to suppose that it was a distinct act of the late Government, as compared with Lord Clarendon's letter, but it was nothing of the kind. It was an order issued by the commander of the East Indies squadron some time after he had received Lord Clarendon's letter, simply carrying out the terms of that letter. This was what the House had before it. They had the Resolution giving the opinion of the House with regard to fugitive slaves, and they had the request that an Address should be presented to Her Majesty asking for all Circulars and Orders to be withdrawn. He wished to repeat that the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford was not brought forward or supported as a Party attack on the present Government, and there could be no Party defeat or humiliation in the acceptance of the Motion. If the first Slave Circular had been in existence, that remark would not have applied. Both sides of the House ought, in fact, to take counsel together as to what should become of fugitive slaves who might obtain the protection of the British flag, remembering that the British Navy was the strongest in the world, and that the British people were proud of having been the champions of freedom for the slave. He was not going to say a word about the first Circular, for that was not now before the House. He did not know whether the Attorney General would think it necessary to speak upon it; but he agreed with the Prime Minister that the country now was only interested in the second Circular. It said that commanders of British vessels should not receive fugitive slaves unless their lives were endangered. It did not expressly say that the slaves should be surrendered; but if a captain were told that directly the danger was over the slave was to be put on shore, there was no doubt the effect was that he would be left to the tender mercies of his master. He would not enter into the question of International Law, for two reasons—first, because there were many lawyers who would take part in the debate this evening; and secondly, because it seemed to him there was no substantial difference of opinion between the Government and his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford on the matter. He apprehended that the British Government had adopted the principle that the British ship was under British law, and he apprehended they had adopted it for the reason that they had recalled their first Circular, which seemed to deny it, while in the second Circular they ordered the captains to maintain the proper exemption of their ships from local jurisdiction. Nevertheless, they, in fact, ordered the captains to surrender fugitives; and the question was, would the House of Commons sanction this, remembering that the rule from 1856 to 1870 was precisely the opposite; remembering also the position of our captains in the matter, our obligation to consider their feelings, and that they had not asked for these instructions, but that they had generally decided these matters in a straightforward and sensible manner, and in a way which might have been advantageously followed by our Admiralty and Foreign Office under both Governments? A naval officer had written a letter to The Times mentioning instances in which he had rescued fugitive slaves whom he could not have received if his discretion had been limited at the time by the existence of this second Circular. On the first night of the Session the Prime Minister gave a different reason from the hon. Member for Tamworth for the issue of a Circular; the Prime Minister said that officers on foreign stations found themselves innocently committing illegal acts, which led to actions being brought against them and the recovery of damages, which had to be paid for them by this country, and that it was easy to understand why they should appeal for Circular instructions. He did not know if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War intended to rest his reasons for issuing the Circular on the same ground as that taken by the Prime Minister, and he thought the House on this question ought to look at the Returns which were sent round only this morning. What did those Returns say? Why, that—

“No distinct case has occurred during the last 10 years relating to fugitive slaves which has ended in an action being brought against a British naval officer.”

It followed that there had been no appeals by captains because no actions had been brought against them and no damages recovered. Now, where was the reason for the Circular? The Return proceeded to mention an “analogous case;” but the official who drew up the Paper must have done so with a slight touch of humour, for the analogous case was as different as possible. It was a case in which one of our ships engaged in putting down the slave trade went into a port and seized a dhow on which there were three women who on inquiry turned out to be voluntary passengers and free women. In this case, then, the captain, with the best possible intentions, got into a difficulty through supposing that the women were captured slaves. The House had before it the second Circular, which declared that in every case captains must put slaves ashore directly danger appeared to be over, and the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford, which asserted that when a slave had obtained the protection of our flag he should be treated as a free man. He could not understand the House having any hesitation as between giving its sanction to the Circular and adopting the Resolution. It was not met with a denial, for the Government could not support and the House would not assent to a denial, but it was met with a proposal to wait for information from a Commission. Did the House wish the Circular to remain in force until the Commissioners reported? The country did not wish it, and not a single constituency would sanction such a course, which involved the denial of freedom to those who had been admitted to our protection. What were they to wait for? The Amendment spoke of the instructions that had been issued; but they were all embodied in the Papers produced, which of course, when the Government first thought of a Commission, they intended to refer to the Commission rather than to Parliament. The House was perfectly well able to form an opinion upon the instructions without the aid of a Commission. The next point of inquiry was as to "the international obligations of this country." He challenged the production of any Treaty by which our power as regarded the reception of slaves on board war ships was in the slightest degree affected; and, if the Amendment referred to the interpretation of International Law, the Government could obtain the highest legal advice from the Lord Chancellor and their Law Officers without attempting to shift the burden of responsibility by placing it upon a Commission. It had been said that another reason for the Commission was the attitude of other States in their treatment of domestic slaves on board national ships. Were we bound to look at the attitude of other countries with regard to this matter? We knew what the attitude of Spain and Portugal was; but even the attitude of France or Germany ought not to have weight with us. He admitted there was one country to whose attitude they ought to look with some anxiety — namely, the United States of America. They were formerly the greatest slave-owning Power; but at the cost of hundreds of millions of money and hundreds of thousands of lives, they had become an anti-slavery Power, and he should be sorry if they, whilst we were waiting for the Report of a Commission, should take an attitude that ought to be taken by us, and issue a Circular that would put to shame both our captains and our country. No, it was an excuse, not information, that was wanted. If that had been required, it would have been obtained, no doubt, before the issue of the first Circular, or at least before the issue of the second. He would wait for the Report of the Commission if he thought no harm would follow; but he thought there would be harm and danger in this course. There was a danger in the Circular remaining in force whilst the Commission was sitting; and secondly, there was a danger because they did not know how far they might be fettered by the Report of the Commission. He did not think this was a matter of sentiment. On the contrary, he looked upon it as a very practical affair. The Prime Minister had spoken of the necessity of ascertaining the law upon the subject, and considering whether by negotiation and treaty with other countries any desirable amendments could be effected; but the freedom of a human being who once gained the protection of the British flag was not a matter which could be left to negotiation or the Report of a Commission; and the question was a very practical one in its bearings upon the continuance of slavery and the slave trade in other parts of the world, for, in spite of all our earnest efforts to put them down, the coolie traffic and other new forms of this evil rendered the danger of any reactionary step almost as great as ever. He should be very sorry to be supposed to imagine that the present Government were not as much in earnest as to the suppression of slavery as any Government that ever existed. No man could have watched them without being convinced of that, especially having regard to the part which Lord Carnarvon had taken in this matter. He was glad to acknowledge that his hon. Friend the

Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had been most active in his endeavours to put down the slave trade as well as slavery, and he was sure that his hon. Friend had set out upon his work in the most willing spirit. Whenever he had spoken on this matter, one thing was quite clear, that he had not only spoken officially, but as of a matter which he had thoroughly at heart. But this was only an additional reason why he thought the Government should take advantage of the Motion of his hon. Friend and accept it as an expression of the opinion of both sides of the House. He was sure if they did so it would be no humiliation on their part; they would rather gain honour and improve their position in the House. However, that was not his concern. His duty was as an independent Member, and he did say this, that if they were to have a Commission—and he supposed a Commission was now appointed and that they must have it—that Commission might be useful if it occupied itself in devising better means for putting down the slave trade. But let it not be hampered by the issue of any Circular or Order. On the contrary, let them have this fact to assist them—that it was the opinion of the House, that if any miserable slave man or slave woman, under any circumstances, or in any way, had once been admitted to the protection of our flag, that slave should be treated as a free man or woman by the Representatives of our Queen, our rule, our principles, and our freedom. The character of the captain of a Queen's ship was that of such a representative. He believed such was the opinion of that House, as he was sure it was the conviction of the country, and he trusted that it would be looked upon as the determination of both, and would be carried into practice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL felt there was a sort of conflict between the burning desire this country had to suppress slavery, and the obligations it was under in regard to foreign States. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Resolution, in a most able and temperate speech, said the subject involved a question of law and a question of policy. He would endeavour to deal with both, although he was more particularly concerned with the question of law. They learnt pretty clearly from the Papers which had been laid on the Table why instructions had been issued on this subject. It seemed that the Government of India had become alive to the difficulties which arose in consequence of slaves—who were the property of the subjects of foreign States where slavery was legalized, States which were in amity with this country—having escaped from their masters and come on board our vessels lying either in the territorial waters of foreign States, or outside those territorial waters. The matter was, therefore, brought under the attention of the proper Department of the Government to be dealt with. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had referred to him in connection with the first Circular, and, as his name had been mixed up with it outside these walls, he might be permitted to say a few words on the subject. He did not pretend that the first Circular should be supported rather than the present one; but, as he had been attacked, he thought the House would allow him to make some short explanation and offer some comments upon it. The proper Department to take cognizance of the subject was the Foreign Office, which, taking into consideration the despatches received from India, after some little interval, sought the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown. The Law Officers of the Crown were then Sir John Karslake and Sir Richard Baggallay, assisted by the standing counsel for the Foreign Office, Dr. Deane. None of those gentlemen were there to defend the course they took or justify the opinion they gave, and he very much regretted their absence. Sir John Karslake, who then held the highest office of the three, had been exiled from the House by a calamity which they all regretted—a calamity which, he believed, had been brought upon him by his devotion and his arduous labours. Sir Richard Baggallay had been elevated to a high position on the Bench, and Dr. Deane did not possess the honour of a seat in that House; but those Gentlemen possessed reputation and learning; they were accomplished, judicious lawyers, and their reputation would speak for them. Having been asked for their opinion upon this matter, they gave it. He was not going through that opinion; but it dealt with slaves getting on board Her Majesty's vessels in territorial waters and at sea, and that opinion was submitted to the proper passengers and free women. In this case, then, the captain, with the best possible intentions, got into a difficulty through supposing that the women were captured slaves. The House had before it the second Circular, which declared that in every case captains must put slaves ashore directly danger appeared to be over, and the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford, which asserted that when a slave had obtained the protection of our flag he should be treated as a free man. He could not understand the House having any hesitation as between giving its sanction to the Circular and adopting the Resolution. It was not met with a denial, for the Government could not support and the House would not assent to a denial, but it was met with a proposal to wait for information from a Commission. Did the House wish the Circular to remain in force until the Commissioners reported? The country did not wish it, and not a single constituency would sanction such a course, which involved the denial of freedom to those who had been admitted to our protection. What were they to wait for? The Amendment spoke of the instructions that had been issued; but they were all embodied in the Papers produced, which of course, when the Government first thought of a Commission, they intended to refer to the Commission rather than to Parliament. The House was perfectly well able to form an opinion upon the instructions without the aid of a Commission. The next point of inquiry was as to "the international obligations of this country." He challenged the production of any Treaty by which our power as regarded the reception of slaves on board war ships was in the slightest degree affected; and, if the Amendment referred to the interpretation of International Law, the Government could obtain the highest legal advice from the Lord Chancellor and their Law Officers without attempting to shift the burden of responsibility by placing it upon a Commission. It had been said that another reason for the Commission was the attitude of other States in their treatment of domestic slaves on board national ships. Were we bound to look at the attitude of other countries with regard to this matter? We knew what the attitude of Spain and Portugal was; but even the attitude of France or Germany ought not to have weight with us. He admitted there was one country to whose attitude they ought to look with some anxiety — namely, the United States of America. They were formerly the greatest slave-owning Power; but at the cost of hundreds of millions of money and hundreds of thousands of lives, they had become an anti-slavery Power, and he should be sorry if they, whilst we were waiting for the Report of a Commission, should take an attitude that ought to be taken by us, and issue a Circular that would put to shame both our captains and our country. No, it was an excuse, not information, that was wanted. If that had been required, it would have been obtained, no doubt, before the issue of the first Circular, or at least before the issue of the second. He would wait for the Report of the Commission if he thought no harm would follow; but he thought there would be harm and danger in this course. There was a danger in the Circular remaining in force whilst the Commission was sitting; and secondly, there was a danger because they did not know how far they might be fettered by the Report of the Commission. He did not think this was a matter of sentiment. On the contrary, he looked upon it as a very practical affair. The Prime Minister had spoken of the necessity of ascertaining the law upon the subject, and considering whether by negotiation and treaty with other countries any desirable amendments could be effected; but the freedom of a human being who once gained the protection of the British flag was not a matter which could be left to negotiation or the Report of a Commission; and the question was a very practical one in its bearings upon the continuance of slavery and the slave trade in other parts of the world, for, in spite of all our earnest efforts to put them down, the coolie traffic and other new forms of this evil rendered the danger of any reactionary step almost as great as ever. He should be very sorry to be supposed to imagine that the present Government were not as much in earnest as to the suppression of slavery as any Government that ever existed. No man could have watched them without being convinced of that, especially having regard to the part which Lord Carnarvon had taken in this matter. He was glad to acknowledge that his hon. Friend the

Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had been most active in his endeavours to put down the slave trade as well as slavery, and he was sure that his hon. Friend had set out upon his work in the most willing spirit. Whenever he had spoken on this matter, one thing was quite clear, that he had not only spoken officially, but as of a matter which he had thoroughly at heart. But this was only an additional reason why he thought the Government should take advantage of the Motion of his hon. Friend and accept it as an expression of the opinion of both sides of the House. He was sure if they did so it would be no humiliation on their part; they would rather gain honour and improve their position in the House. However, that was not his concern. His duty was as an independent Member, and he did say this, that if they were to have a Commission—and he supposed a Commission was now appointed and that they must have it—that Commission might be useful if it occupied itself in devising better means for putting down the slave trade. But let it not be hampered by the issue of any Circular or Order. On the contrary, let them have this fact to assist them—that it was the opinion of the House, that if any miserable slave man or slave woman, under any circumstances, or in any way, had once been admitted to the protection of our flag, that slave should be treated as a free man or woman by the Representatives of our Queen, our rule, our principles, and our freedom. The character of the captain of a Queen's ship was that of such a representative. He believed such was the opinion of that House, as he was sure it was the conviction of the country, and he trusted that it would be looked upon as the determination of both, and would be carried into practice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL felt there was a sort of conflict between the burning desire this country had to suppress slavery, and the obligations it was under in regard to foreign States. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Resolution, in a most able and temperate speech, said the subject involved a question of law and a question of policy. He would endeavour to deal with both, although he was more particularly concerned with the question of law. They learnt pretty clearly from the Papers which had been laid on the Table why instructions had been issued on this subject. It seemed that the Government of India had become alive to the difficulties which arose in consequence of slaves—who were the property of the subjects of foreign States where slavery was legalized, States which were in amity with this country—having escaped from their masters and come on board our vessels lying either in the territorial waters of foreign States, or outside those territorial waters. The matter was, therefore, brought under the attention of the proper Department of the Government to be dealt with. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had referred to him in connection with the first Circular, and, as his name had been mixed up with it outside these walls, he might be permitted to say a few words on the subject. He did not pretend that the first Circular should be supported rather than the present one; but, as he had been attacked, he thought the House would allow him to make some short explanation and offer some comments upon it. The proper Department to take cognizance of the subject was the Foreign Office, which, taking into consideration the despatches received from India, after some little interval, sought the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown. The Law Officers of the Crown were then Sir John Karslake and Sir Richard Baggallay, assisted by the standing counsel for the Foreign Office, Dr. Deane. None of those gentlemen were there to defend the course they took or justify the opinion they gave, and he very much regretted their absence. Sir John Karslake, who then held the highest office of the three, had been exiled from the House by a calamity which they all regretted—a calamity which, he believed, had been brought upon him by his devotion and his arduous labours. Sir Richard Baggallay had been elevated to a high position on the Bench, and Dr. Deane did not possess the honour of a seat in that House; but those Gentlemen possessed reputation and learning; they were accomplished, judicious lawyers, and their reputation would speak for them. Having been asked for their opinion upon this matter, they gave it. He was not going through that opinion; but it dealt with slaves getting on board Her Majesty's vessels in territorial waters and at sea, and that opinion was submitted to the proper authority. It did not touch on the question of slaves in a country with which this Government had a Treaty—slaves getting on board and claiming their freedom in terms of the Treaty. There were several Treaties with countries to this effect—that, after a certain date, slavery in those countries should cease, and everybody should be free, while up to that date every one in slavery should continue in it. The Government sought the opinion of the Law Officers. Sir Richard Baggallay was Attorney General, and he (Sir John Holker) had the honour to be Solicitor General. The opinion of the Law Officers and Dr. Deane would be found practically embodied in the Letter which was written by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and which was to be found in the Papers before the House. That Letter was submitted to the Law Officers, and they were asked whether it substantially conveyed the opinion they had expressed, and they said it did. That was all the explanation he had to make about that Letter. There was one little clause not originally in that Letter as it came under the attention of the Law Officers, but was inserted afterwards between the Foreign Office and the Admiralty—that in surrendering slaves certain steps should be taken to insure their proper treatment. That was what had been called by the Mover of the Resolution the crumb of comfort which the Circular contained. The Letter of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs having been laid before the Law Officers, and they having stated that it expressed their opinion substantially, he felt himself as responsible for the earlier opinion as for the later one just as much as any of his legal friends. He did not shrink from saying so; because, whatever opinion might be entertained by others, he believed that, in substance, the opinions on which the first Slave Circular was founded were right, and, except in one particular, were open to no objection whatever. He might be wrong; but the House would pardon him for expressing the opinion he entertained. The first Circular was framed on these opinions. It might be lacking in precision and accuracy of language—it was redundant, and, perhaps, dealing with the question of the surrender of slaves, it was open to greater objection, and on these grounds it was withdrawn. Both the original and the present Circular had been attacked not merely on account of the phraseology which had been used, but of the idea which that phraseology was intended to express, as conveying a false and erroneous notion of the law relating to slavery and as springing from a false idea of the policy which ought to be pursued towards the nations where slavery was law. Now, the first Circular dealt with slaves under three conditions—first, with slaves getting on board a British public vessel lying in the territorial waters of a foreign Power; secondly, with slaves getting on board a British public vessel lying outside territorial waters on the high seas, or outside the three-mile limit; and thirdly with slaves, or rather with persons who were the subjects of a Power with whom this country had a treaty, to the effect that after a certain date slavery should cease, and that up to that date all those in slavery should remain so, seeking refuge by resort to a British vessel, asserting that they were free, and asking that their freedom might be respected. Two different views seemed to be taken of the law on this matter. These views had not been propounded with distinctness except by the hon. Gentleman who opened this debate; but one might know what they were from what had been stated outside the House. The first view seemed to be that a slave who got on board a British public vessel was to be kept there, according to what was called “the popular doctrine,” which had been advocated by the hon. Member for Bedford to-night, and in and out of the House by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford—namely, that the deck of that public vessel was to all intents and purposes British soil, and had the attributes of British soil, so that when a slave got there he was free. The hon. Member for Bedford contended that the slave was to be kept on board. [Mr. WHITBREAD: I did not say that he was to be kept there, but that he was not to be sent away.] Well, the slave was either to be kept there or not to be sent away. The lawyers said he was not to be sent away; but that amounted to the same thing as saying that he was to be kept in the ship; because by the comity of nations, by the courtesy which one nation extended to another, the foreign Power in whose waters the vessel was lying would not, ought not to, and could not exercise any jurisdiction upon her deck. These were the two views presented of the question, and he would like to examine them to see whether they were sound in law. The matter was of the gravest possible moment. It was not represented by any one that the Government were desirous to protect slavery; but it was expedient to come to a conclusion as to the legal position of this question. Now, let the House consider the position of a British public vessel regarded as British soil, and lying, not merely in territorial waters, but in the harbour of a foreign State, pressing against the very wall of a foreign quay, with the foreign dominions stretching all around her. This was a matter worthy of the gravest consideration, because consequences of the gravest character would flow from this doctrine. He knew that it had been said by eminent writers on International Law that, in the waters of a foreign State, a public vessel was part of the territory of the country to which she belonged. But that expression was only used for the purpose of conveying in a short and succinct phrase the idea of the legal status of such a vessel, which it might take a long and involved statement, or perhaps a chapter to explain with accuracy. But nothing was more dangerous in dealing with a legal argument of any kind than a resort to metaphor; and on this question more error had arisen from the use of metaphor than from anything else. He did not say this merely for the purpose of defending his own view; but he might appeal to the authority of many eminent writers as to the abuse of metaphorical language. He would content himself, however, with quoting from one most eminent and accomplished, though diffident writer, "Historicus," who, in one of his letters to The Times 10 years ago, dealt with the question of metaphor, though not in connection with the subject now under discussion. Speaking of Bastiat, "Historicus" said that that acute writer in all the impatience of common sense had put up a prayer to Heaven to preserve us from metaphor, but that Heaven had not been pleased to hearken to his prayer; and he went on to say that images were pestilent enough in the domain of politics and religion, but nowhere were they more noxious than in the sanctuary of the law. Referring to the position that a neutral merchant vessel was an integral portion of neutral territory, "Historicus" said that the metaphor employed in the case assumed everything which it was intended to prove; and again, he said that to say a neutral merchant vessel in time of war was like neutral territory was to compare Hamlet's cloud to a weasel and to a whale. It was upon ideas of this kind that the whole argument of the popular orators on this subject was built up. To what extent might this go? If a public vessel of war was British soil, and had all the legal rights of British soil, the captain of such a vessel might not only receive on the deck of his ship one slave, but 100 slaves would have a right to swim there, and a slave or slaves who came on board with their master on business might claim their freedom, and the captain of the vessel must allow that claim. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen said "Hear;" but had they no obligations, no duties to other nations as well as to slaves? Were they altogether to disregard and outrage the laws of a country with which they were at peace? If the argument of the hon. Gentleman opposite were well-founded, the commander of a vessel must receive on board his ship deserters, murderers, and felons of every description, and give them an asylum in his ship. That he (the Attorney General) maintained was a consequence which legitimately flowed from the doctrine that the deck of a public ship was equivalent to soil. It was very well for the inhabitants of this country to plume themselves upon their power and to talk with complacency of the slave-emancipating character of the British soil; but let us apply to ourselves that doctrine which we applied now to Powers who, perhaps, were not strong enough to resist our pretensions by force. Let us imagine that the public vessel of a State with which we had no treaty for the extradition of criminals was in Plymouth Harbour, that a score of convicts or a wretch who had committed murder sought refuge in that vessel. Let us imagine that when we made a request that those convicts or murderers who had escaped and gone on board that vessel should be put on shore, the commander thereof strongly refused to comply with the request on the ground that a foreign vessel was foreign shore. In such a case would he tamely submit to the doctrine which he had been contending for? Reference had been made to some legal authorities. He was not going to trouble the House with any discussion upon legal authorities, as though he were engaged in arguing this matter in one of the Courts of Westminster Hall; but he would just draw the attention of the House to this—that the legal authorities which had been cited and which might be cited went to this, and this only—that when a man was on English soil, or, if they liked, on board an English public or private ship on the high seas, he was absolutely free. Why was he free? Because the municipal law of England knew of no such thing as slavery, and did not allow any machinery to be put in force for the purpose of dominion being exercised by one man over his fellow-man. But that was the only reason why he was free. There was no magic in the British soil, or any other soil. Mr. Justice Holroyd in "Forbes v. Cochrane" said that a slave who arrived in England was a slave no longer, but simply because there was no law here to sanction his detention in slavery. Whilst, however, our municipal law did not recognize slavery, yet the law in this country did regard and hold sacred the law of other countries; and when the law of other countries was brought into play with reference to transactions which took place in other countries, that law had been repeatedly regarded in our Courts, and decisions had been pronounced on the footing that that law was right. In the judgment given by Sir William Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell) in the case of the Louise, we had this laid down in regard to the law of foreign countries. He said—

"There are nations which adhere to the practice of trading in slaves with all the encouragements which their own law can give it. What is the doctrine of our Courts and of the Law of Nations in reference to them? Why, that their practice is to be respected; that their slaves, if taken, are to be restored to them, and, if not taken under an innocent mistake, are to be restored with costs and damages."

That was the opinion of one of the most eminent Judges, he (the Attorney General) supposed, who ever flourished in this or any other country. Then we had a case in which a British cruiser took a Spanish vessel and the slaves out of it. The question which came before the Court was, whether compensation could be obtained by a Spanish subject from the commander of a cruiser, not only for the detention and injury to his ship, but for the destruction of his property; and what did the law say about that? After a solemn discussion upon the question, it was held that the Spanish subject might maintain his action not only for the damage to his ship and the detention, but also for £18,000 the value of the slaves. So recently as 1860, in the Exchequer Chamber, one of the principal Appeal Courts in this country, it was decided that an action would lie on a contract made in Brazil for the sale of slaves, in the Courts of this country. He did not cite these authorities to controvert the doctrine that a slave coming to England was free; but to show that in our Courts the laws of foreign countries were always regarded and held in respect. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) and some others entertained a specious view upon this subject. They said, in the first place, that it was a principle of International Law that a vessel in the territorial waters of a foreign Power could not have exercised over her any jurisdiction by that Power; and, assuming that to be law, they founded certain conclusions upon it, the principal one being that, because, owing to the comity of nations, a foreign Power would not exercise any jurisdiction upon the deck of a British vessel, therefore, if a slave came on board a British public vessel, he must be allowed to remain there. Now, it was not by any means clear to him (the Attorney General), that the International Law was what had been stated. If you referred to Marshall, you would find it much more qualified than it was stated by his hon. and learned Friend. If you referred to Story, you would find it qualified by this condition—that a ship in foreign water must behave herself in a friendly manner, and comply with the laws of that foreign State; and Chief Justice Best held that slaves might be claimed from a foreign ship of war in the waters of Florida. "Historicus" also laboured some months ago to establish the doctrine to which he (the Attorney General) had been referring. He did not say that the view of the authorities he had cited was the right view; but he said that what was the right view could not be decided except by a careful reference to all the authorities on the subject, and that the House of Commons was not the body by which such a matter could be satisfactorily settled. But even assuming, for the sake of argument, that a foreign State could not exercise jurisdiction over a British public in its own waters, it did not follow that a slave going on board that vessel was to be allowed to remain there. There was no obligation on the captain to let him, any more than any other stranger, remain on board, and the captain might tell him he must leave or be removed by force. That, it might be said, was a surrender of the slave. He cared not whether it was so or not. He had every compassion for the slave, but he was dealing with the question on legal principles; and the slave by coming on board had broken the law of his own country, and the captain who received and harboured him aided him in breaking that law, and also broke it himself. It did not matter whether the foreign State could obtain redress for that in her own Courts or not. It could obtain it by diplomatic remonstrance; and the same thing would happen if we encouraged a breach of the law of the place where our public ships lay; those ships would be turned away from waters where they had before been welcomed as friends. Again, if the commander of one of those vessels must thus disregard the municipal law and not in any way respect it, it would equally follow that, should any criminal get on board, the commander would be entitled to say that he must remain there, and that he could not recognize that law, as it did not apply to his ship. Therefore, according to the same argument, he would be obliged to receive a deserter or a criminal—nay, he might refuse to deliver up stolen property carried on board his vessel and concealed there. They might as well say, because an Ambassador was not subject to the municipal law of the country to which he was sent as our Representative, therefore he might with impunity break its laws whenever an opportunity occurred. This would be to graft upon that privilege the right to outrage that law. With regard to slaves getting on board our vessels upon the high seas, he knew that there had been great feeling expressed contrary to what was stated in the first Circular; but he trusted that they would not rush to the opinion that a thing was wrong simply because some one said it was wrong. A slave when he got on board a British ship, whether public or private, on the high seas, was undoubtedly free, because our municipal law, which prevailed on board, knew nothing of slavery; but what would happen when the vessel went back to the territorial waters of that man's own country? He had broken its law by getting on board that vessel, and his country had as much right to complain of his doing so as if he had got there in its territorial waters. He could not see that great distinction between the slave getting on board on the high seas and getting on board in territorial waters. In neither case was the captain under an obligation to treat the man as a slave as long as he remained on board, but he was entitled to say—"I can't allow you to remain any longer." The hon. Member who moved the Resolution seemed to think the commander of a British ship of war was bound to receive fugitive slaves on the high seas under all circumstances. But why? If a slave got on board such a ship on the high seas he generally escaped from the deck of a vessel of his own country; and if they applied the metaphor to which he had referred, the vessel of his own country was as much a part of that country's territory as the British ship was a part of ours. Therefore, he as much broke the law of his country by flying from a vessel such as that as when he got on board one of our ships in territorial waters. The Resolution proposed was a very seductive one. It meant that slaves on British vessels should not be interfered with. But look at the case of foreign nations with which we had Treaties for doing away with slavery. The nature of the Treaty generally was that the foreign Powers should, after a certain date, abolish slavery; but up to that date those who were in slavery were to remain in slavery. Were such Treaties, obtained at great expense and trouble, in the interests of freedom, to be observed or not? If a man who alleged that he was free in virtue of such a Treaty got on board of a British ship-of-war, why should not her commander allow the man to make out his case, and, if his allegation proved correct, require the Treaty to be observed in his favour? On the other hand, if the slave's claim to be free was not made out, why, in equal fairness, was not the Treaty to be observed when it was in favour of the Government with whom we had concluded it? Could the solemn engagements of this country be set at nought on account of some popular clamour? It would not become him to find fault with the second Circular, which was infinitely more in favour of freedom than the first—more tender, so to speak, and less antagonistic to popular prejudice. Now, a word as to the policy that the Circulars indicated. It was said that they indicated that this country was desirous of pursuing some policy that had not been pursued by former Governments. They had heard of the “traditional policy” of this country with respect to slavery. He did not profess to know what that meant; but he knew this, that since the commencement of the century all the Governments of this country—Conservative and Liberal alike—had been eager in their desire to put an end to slavery by every means in their power. A mere glance at the Schedule to the Slave Trade Consolidation Act of 1873, with its numerous statutes and Treaties, would be quite sufficient to satisfy anyone what had been the policy of this country with respect to slavery. But it had never been suggested, as far as he knew, by any Government that because slavery was objectionable it was desirable to extinguish it by force—by disregarding and outraging the laws and institutions of foreign Powers. A reference to the Orders issued by the late Government would show that they took the very same view of the matter as the present Government had hitherto taken—namely, that although it was desirable by every legitimate means to put a stop to slavery, yet it was not to be done by disregarding the laws of other countries. He referred to those instructions not for the purpose of raising a blush to the cheeks of right hon. Gentlemen opposite—if that were possible—but simply to show what the policy of the country had been. The instructions issued by the present Government had been loudly assailed; but if right hon. Gentlemen opposite had borne in mind what they themselves had done they would probably have adopted a fairer and more moderate tone. For himself, he believed that the instructions, in spite of all that had been said, were founded upon a true sense of justice. It was only proper that we should deal fairly and justly with friendly nations, and treat them as we ourselves would desire to be treated. Well, if we did that—if we consulted the wishes of friendly nations—if we acquired the confidence and respect of those nations—if we entered into Treaties with them—we were much more likely to put a stop to slavery than by any mere grandiloquent talk about the freedom of the slave or any bluster about a down-trodden race. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) seemed to think that because England was powerful she could do what she liked with regard to slave-owning States which were insignificant and weak; but was it worthy of a great nation like this to play the bully by threatening only when her adversaries were feeble and oppressed?

Mr. W. HOLMS said, it had been suggested that provision should be made for compensating the owners of slaves; but the Return issued that morning showed that there had not been a single case in which owners of slaves had asked for compensation, and it was not usual in this country to give compensation that was not asked for. The result of giving compensation, he was afraid, would be that slave owners would be pleased to see their slaves take refuge on British ships. It had been asked why the Circular had been issued at all, and the question had been answered by the Prime Minister and Lord Derby, their answers being this—“We issued these instructions because they were necessary, and in accordance with law and precedent.” The despatches of Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon had already been referred to, but there was this great distinction between them—that the former were issued privately, while the present Circular appeared to all the world as having been issued by the British Government, and issued notwithstanding that feeling in this country had been so strongly expressed against the policy on which it was drawn. He ventured to say that if the Station Order of 1871 had been made public, it would have received criticism as keen and opposition as strong as this Circular. The Circular was first of all drawn up under the guidance of the Attorney General, the late Attorney General (Sir Richard Baggallay), and Sir John Karslake, but doubts were said to have been thrown upon it by the Lord Chancellor, and the second Circular was issued under his guidance. It was not for him to say the value of a Lord Chancellor's opinion, compared with the opinion of three such eminent lawyers; but he might be excused if, amid such perplexity, he doubted if the second Circular was more in accordance with law than the first, and he doubted this all the more because it did not recognize the long-established decision that there was no difference between the soil of England and a British ship, and that while the commander of one of Her Majesty's ships was not bound to take slaves on board, once he let them on board he was bound to keep them. According to the Attorney General, this was only meant in a metaphorical sense, and he was very sorry to hear such a statement made by a Gentleman of so much eminence. If the decision of the Lord Chancellor was right, they must bring their practice and their policy into harmony with that opinion, or, by adopting the solution of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whitbread), again say that the law was now what it was in 1824. They must abandon either the position that the deck of a British vessel was as free as the soil of England, or the position that a slave was free when he touched British soil. The Prime Minister had given as a reason for issuing this Circular, that commanding officers got frequently into difficulties, and had actions brought against them. He was unable to find any foundation for that statement. He (Mr. Holmes) had moved for the Return which had been issued that morning, and in which he had been careful to use the exact words of the Prime Minister. It commenced in 1838, and came up to the present date, thus extending over 37 years. Now, what did they find in that Return? They found that in these 37 years only seven cases had occurred of fugitive slaves taking refuge on board British ships, and in these only 15 persons were concerned. All these cases had been settled in an amicable manner, and he could not find a single instance in which any bad feeling arose between this country and those countries in whose territorial waters the slaves were met. There was not a single case in which an action had been brought, or damages incurred, or compensation given on account of slaves who had taken refuge on board British ships. He thought, under these circumstances, the Prime Minister should state precisely what were the grounds on which the Circular was considered necessary. The issue of the Circular seemed to be due to one circumstance, and to the representation of one man. On the 31st of August, 1873, one of Her Majesty's ships in the Persian Gulf saw 73 pearl boats in territorial waters, and when they went to sea the man-of-war followed. Immediately they saw they were followed they went back to the harbour, and the commander of the man-of-war consulted with the British Resident as to what he should do. The result was that a despatch was sent home to the Government, and that formed the groundwork of the hypothetical case given in the first Circular as the reason for its issue. It turned out that the place where that occurred was not in territorial waters, but on the high seas, and the slave was let free, and as the Circular gave no power to liberate slaves under such circumstances, it would not allay the fears of the political Resident, for whose benefit it was issued. Why, he asked, had the Government, who were asked for instructions in March, 1874, delayed their decision till the 31st July, 1875, when they issued their famous Circular? As to the Circular now in force, he would consider what would be its practical effect if its instructions were acted on. In one paragraph the commanding officer was told "that he is not to enter into any examination as to the status of the fugitive slave,"

And in the next he was instructed

"should any person claim admission to your ship and protection on the ground that he has been kept in a state of slavery contrary to Treaties existing between Great Britain and the territory, you may receive him until the truth of his statement is examined into."

But it was a mockery to suppose that an ignorant slave, who could neither read nor write, and who certainly could have no means of access to a library of reference in order to find a particular Treaty, could make any such claim. In the Correspondence referred to, the House would find the reasons the slaves gave, and they were most instructive. In 1869 two slaves took refuge on board Her Majesty's ship Nymph. One said he had been abused by his master, and that he understood "the English had good hearts;" and the other said he knew "that once on board an English man-of-war he should be a slave no longer." This was a noble and inspiring thought to the poor slave, and he was sure the English people would not willingly allow it to be numbered with the things of the past. In another case five fugitive slaves escaped to Her Majesty's ship Dryad off the coast of Madagascar. The commander examined into their status and found that four of them were entitled to their freedom under the 17th section of the Treaty of 1865, and they were set at liberty with the concurrence of the authorities of Madagascar. Under the existing Circular the captain would have been prohibited from examining into the status of the slaves, and they would not have been permitted to remain on board, and would have been sent back to slavery; the authorities at Madagascar being thus enabled to set their Treaty engagement with us at defiance. As the Circular now stood, it appeared that if it had been penned by a committee of slave owners it could scarcely have been more in accordance with their wishes, or less in favour of the fugitive slaves. He had been unable to discover in the Correspondence one instance of a slave being enticed on board one of Her Majesty's ships, while there were several instances of their being refused admission. Therefore, it seemed to him that British officers might safely be left to their discretion, guided by such a general exposition of the law as was given to Colonel Petty in 1869 by the Indian Government, namely—

"The commander of a British ship of war is not bound to receive fugitive slaves on board his vessel; yet if he does receive them they become free. And the commander of a British man-of-war would not only be authorised in refusing to surrender a slave who had found refuge on board his vessel, but would incur very serious legal responsibilities if he in any way attempted to coerce that slave to return to his master."

In this country there was a dislike to laws of a hard-and-fast character to meet peculiar and exceptional cases, and what could be more exceptional than the case of a fugitive slave? On an average, since 1838 only one had occurred every five years, and the whole number only affected 14 individuals, still more did the English people dislike what was supposed to be an official recognition of slavery; and therefore he should have great pleasure in supporting the Resolution of the hon. Member for Bedford. He did so the more willingly, as some doubt had recently been thrown on the earnestness of this country in suppressing the slave trade. In the Foreign Office might be found a Correspondence that took place in 1874, in which the United States Secretary for Foreign Affairs called attention to the fact that the trade in slaves was being carried on between Tripoli and Constantinople, by way of Malta, and alleging that it was connived at by the authorities of that island. A Commission appointed by Lord Derby to examine the circumstances acquitted the authorities of blame. This was communicated to the American Government, which merely acknowledged the communication, and expressed no agreement with the finding; but it had since appeared that their attention was still directed to discovering whether additional proof could not be found to show that the Maltese authorities were abetting slavery on British soil. Therefore, he said, it was the more necessary that as a nation we should do nothing to mark, or even appear to mark, a change in our policy; but that now, as formerly, we should fearlessly maintain the principle of the personal freedom of every man, of whatever race or colour, who might set foot on British soil, or on board a British man-of-war.

SIR JOHN HAY, as one of the few naval officers in the House who had had the honour of serving under the instructions and Treaties issued or agreed to by this country for the suppression of the slave trade, and, as far as might be, the doing away with domestic slavery in foreign countries, desired to say a few words on the subject under discussion. He entirely concurred with what the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had said respecting the first part of his Resolution, and he likewise concurred in the desire of his hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury) that this complicated question should be referred to a Royal Commission. At the same time, he was extremely desirous that naval officers should be relieved from the complicated instructions involved in the numerous Circulars which had been issued for their guidance. The letter of the Acting Resident in the Persian Gulf to Mr. Aitchison, in the Correspondence on the case of the May Frere, gave the belief of nine out of ten naval officers on this question when it said that—

"A commander was not bound to receive fugitive slaves on board his vessel; yet if he did receive them, they became free."

That he believed to be the recognized law of the country. The letter from which he quoted proceeded to say that—

"The commander of a British man-of-war would not only be authorized in refusing to surrender a slave who had found refuge on board his vessel, but would incur very serious legal responsibilities if he in any way attempted to coerce that slave to return to his master."

That appeared to be the whole creed of naval officers who had to carry out the duties entrusted to them; and he heard with great regret that any explanations or involved instructions had been conveyed to the Navy which would contradict this very clear exposition of what was their belief up to the time of the issue of these recent Circulars. Of course, he was not aware what other Circulars of a "more stringent character" had been issued; but it was hard to have those Circulars interfering with the just discretion of commanders. If it had been necessary to issue special instructions with regard to India, the Persian Gulf, and Zanzibar, they might have been of a local character, issued through the Naval Commander in Chief on the Station, and applicable only to each particular case. He disclaimed sympathy with any argument that made out the British ship-of-war to be a refuge for the destitute. Discipline had to be maintained on board Her Majesty's ships, and a slave would only get on board through the negligence of those in charge of the watch of the ship. Until he heard the opinion of the Attorney General that evening he had always believed that such a slave would become actually free; but the officer through whose negligence he came on board would be liable to trial by Court-martial for permitting that person to come on board when he had no business there. He had had the honour of serving in the West Indies, the East Indies, at the Cape of Good Hope, and in South America, and he had never heard of such an occurrence as a slave coming on board and claiming his freedom. It was the business of the officer in command to prevent any circumstance of the kind occurring, seeing it might give rise to international difficulties. Before the American Civil War Her Majesty's ships were cautioned not to go into Charlestown, New Orleans, and other ports, where a slave coming on board and ipso facto becoming free would occasion complications with a great nation which it was desired to avoid. He would be sorry if this Circular was allowed to continue in force longer than could possibly be helped, so as to throw upon naval officers greater difficulties with reference to this delicate duty. What he would say to the First Lord of the Treasury was—desire the Admiralty to suspend the action of the Circular, let the question be referred to the Royal Commission, and let the Navy continue to perform their duties as they had done for the last 37 years without leading to any national complications.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY considered this an occasion on which the House of Commons was virtually called upon to pronounce an opinion whether we ought to assist the slaveholders in recovering fugitive slaves. If the House maintained the Circular, it would not merely be carrying out the intentions of those who by Treaty had bound us not to interfere with domestic slavery; but would be aiding the slaveowner in recovering what he considered to be his property. This could not be considered a Party question, for many hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House were as much opposed to slavery as he was; but they might perhaps wrongly consider that they were called upon to rally round the Government when they had made a mistake, whereas the Government might put everything right by withdrawing this Circular. The temporary orders and instructions issued by preceding Governments to particular squadrons engaged in putting down the slave trade, and meant only for the eye of the commanders of those particular vessels, could not be justified, but were no precedents for the present action of the Government. These earlier orders treated slavery as only a temporary institution, and were not meant to convey an abiding principle of action; and there was an essential difference between them and Circulars adopted by the Cabinet, publicly addressed to the whole Navy, treating slavery as a permanent institution, and regarded by all the world as expressing the deliberate policy of England with reference to slavery. The hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury) said that we had always respected the so-called rights of slaveholding people in these matters. He would remind the hon. Member what we had done in 1816, when we bombarded Algiers and killed 7,000 Algerines to put down white slavery; and of the Aberdeen Act of 1845, which authorized the seizure of Brazilian vessels, even in Brazilian waters, because Brazil would not perform her Treaty engagements about the slave trade. If the House of Commons refused to adopt the Resolution which had been proposed, and which was made necessary by the issue forced upon it by the publication of the Papers before them, and by the issuing of these Circulars, they would be for the first time saying that England did recognize slavery—that she recognized it as a municipal law in other countries which she would as far as she could by her Imperial officers support and maintain. He considered the proposition of the hon. Member for Tamworth a most extraordinary one; for it declared that—

“In order to maintain most effectually the right of personal liberty, it was desirable to await further information from the Report of a Royal Commission, both as to the instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers, the international obligations of this Country, and the attitude of other States in regard to the treatment of domestic Slaves on board of National ships.”

To maintain personal liberty we were to delay rescinding a Circular which infringed it; and what had this country to do with the attitude of other States? We should never have taken one step in the direction we had taken if we had waited on the attitude of other States. As to the Royal Commission, the inquiry was sure to be instructive, but it was employing a Nasmyth's hammer to crack a nut, for the point at issue lay in a nutshell, and he was not willing to wait for the Report of the Royal Commission to abrogate the Circular. All that was wanted was that slaves should be treated on just the same footing as political refugees. The question had been forced upon the House by the action of the Government; it had been emphatically answered by the country, and he for one, and for once, should rejoice that there was a Conservative majority in this House, if it would only prove itself conservative of our consistency and reputation as an anti-slavery Power.

MR. A. MILLS said, he thought it was scarcely consistent on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) to ask the acceptance by the House of a Resolution which was practically an attack upon the Government, and, at the same time, to describe the proposal to refer the question to a Royal Commission as an excuse for delay. The appointment of a Royal Commission would at least have one good effect, if it only enlightened the right hon. Gentleman as to one point on which he appeared to be remarkably ignorant; he alluded to the Act of 1873, which was passed by a Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member. The Slave Trade Consolidation Act of 1824, which might be described as the charter of fugitive and rescued slaves, as far as English legislation on the subject had proceeded up to that time, contained the following clause:—

“Provided always, and be it further enacted, that in case any person or persons illegally held or detained in slavery shall hereafter, by shipwreck or otherwise, be cast upon, or shall escape to or arrive at any island or colony, fort, territory, or place under the dominion or in the possession of His Majesty, it shall and may be lawful for His Majesty, his heirs and successors, or for any such officers, civil or military, as aforesaid, to deal with, protect, and provide for any such person or persons, in such and the same manner as is hereinbefore directed with respect to persons condemned as prize of war or as forfeited under this Act.”

The House might not be aware that this clause was repealed by the Act of 1873, the effect of which was very accurately described by a correspondent (Mr. Hutchinson), who wrote to Lady Burdett-Coutts as follows:—

“In connection with the new Treaty of 1873 with Zanzibar two Acts of Parliament were passed. One, called the Slave Trade Consolidation Act, repeals nearly the whole of the original Act of 1824, obliterates at one stroke all the provisions which formed the safeguard of the slave—both rescued and escaped—and repeals all the Acts which confirm the Treaties with the 24 Powers already mentioned. In place of the careful provision for the rescued slave of the old Act, all it has to say is that they shall be disposed of in such manner, or delivered over to such persons, as the Court (the Consul) may adjudge, subject to the regulations (if any) from time to time made by the Treasury. It will at once be evident that the position of matters is changed. The Consul may now hand over slaves who have trod the deck of an English man-of-war to anyone; and as a fact, at this moment, the slaves rescued by our cruisers are handed over in the dominion of Zanzibar practically to become subjects of a Mahomedan slave-holding Prince. May not it be fairly said that this is, indeed, a retrograde policy, and utterly opposed to the real feeling and wishes of the English nation."

There seemed to be a great amount of ignorance prevailing upon this matter in the country generally. Not long ago Mr. Bouverie, a right hon. Gentleman, once a Member of that House, described the Liberal Party as "whistling for a wind." That "wind" came in the shape of these Circulars, and they were followed by numerous meetings in various parts of the country, at which a great amount of ignorance and exaggeration was shown. It was like Satan rebuking Sin for the authors of the Act of 1873 to condemn the Circulars issued by the present Government. He deprecated any attempt to make the present discussion an occasion for political tu quoque. Let them not lose the occasion of reviewing their policy in reference to the slave trade as well as in reference to fugitive slaves. The time had come when they should cease from Party recriminations, and he hoped that instead of amusing themselves by passing abstract Resolutions, which meant nothing and bound no one, they would go forward in this matter as became a nation which inherited traditions from its great men which had made England the champion of the oppressed and the friend of the slave. A few days ago the Prime Minister informed the House it would be in the power of the Commission to inquire into the entire question; and he therefore hoped that steps would be taken to secure a re-enactment of some provisions of the Act of 1824 which were repealed by the Act of 1873, and thus discourage the East African Slave Trade. This could not be really suppressed without sore sacrifices, which he believed the country would willingly make for the extinction of the trade both by land and sea; and by making some provision for the disposal of liberated slaves on the East Coast of Africa.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that this was a question too Imperial and world-wide in its interest to be settled by Party recrimination and by tu quoque arguments. On that side of the House they did not indulge in Party recriminations. He was not there to defend the acts of the past Government; but if the past Government had done wrong that did not make the action of the present Government right. He always approached the domain of International Law with fear and trembling, because International Law was not embodied in Acts of Parliament or judicial decisions, but had to be picked out from a number of text-writers who did not always agree either with each other or themselves. Although this applied generally, exceptions were, of course, to be found. Two principles of International Law were clear. The first was that no nation was bound in the absence of an Extradition Treaty to deliver up even a fugitive from justice, much less a fugitive from slavery. The second was that, to use the words of Mr. Justice Holroyd, a British man-of-war was for this purpose "a floating island of British territory," and that therefore a fugitive once admitted on board one of Her Majesty's ships should be as safe as if he were in Leicester Square. He believed that if it had been frankly stated at the outset that the first Circular was the result of the ill-considered opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown—and he would be the last to quarrel with an erroneous opinion on the part of a lawyer—the country would have brought in a verdict of extenuating circumstances, and the matter would have now been forgotten. It now appeared, however, that the Circular was the result of a lengthened period of gestation in the Foreign Office. The lines of the first Circular were traced in the letter which issued from the Foreign Office, on the 30th April, and it was issued on the 31st July, but was not withdrawn until the 6th October, and then only in deference to such an outcry from the country as was scarcely ever heard before. He thought they were entitled to some explanation of that delay. Then he came to the second Circular, which was issued by the advice of the Lord Chancellor, and they were told that it contained the true law on the question, and by which they should abide. It was certainly better than the first Circular to this extent—it admitted that on the high seas the deck of a British man-of-war was an asylum for everybody who was admitted to it; but it practically denied that right of asylum as far as territorial waters were concerned, and the authority of the Lord

Chancellor was quoted for that proposition. But were there no authorities the other way? Sir Travers Twiss, no mean authority, had gathered together and published in the last Law Magazine the opinion of distinguished jurists on the subject, and it amounted to this that "all public ships of war navigating or lying within the territorial waters of a foreign State are altogether exempt from its jurisdiction," and he added that that did not, of course, apply to merchant ships. The Attorney General had argued that merchant ships were liable to the law of the territory in whose waters they were—a proposition which no one denied; but it was not so with ships of war. The case of "Forbes v. Cochran" had been relied on; but, as he read the decision in that case, it was a distinct authority for the extraterritoriality of British men-of-war in foreign waters. In his opinion, the Circulars were stereotyped declarations in favour of slavery. They would be construed most strongly against us by foreign States, and if the law they laid down was held to be good as regarded slaves, how could any other law be laid down with respect to political refugees? Suppose that during the Reign of Terror in Naples Baron Poerio or any other distinguished political prisoner had escaped from his prison and taken refuge on board a British man-of-war, upon the principle of the second Circular they would be bound to give him up; but was there a man in England—was there even a member of the Peace Society—who would not rather have gone to war than commit so dastardly an act as that? Why had the Government issued the Circular at all? Why had they not acted on the principle of Lord Melbourne's advice—"Can you not let it alone?" That was a sentiment eminently Conservative, and which might be commended to the consideration of a Conservative Government. But it was said that a Royal Commission would put everything right. For his part, he regarded a Royal Commission as a proof of weakness—particularly an ex post facto Commission. What was it to do? Was it to inquire whether the Lord Chancellor's law was sound? Was it to say whether the Government had done right in issuing the Circular? Was not that acting first and deliberating afterwards—hanging a man first, and then instituting an inquiry into the legality of his sentence? It was said that we ought to be guided by the practice of other nations in such matters, and that an inquiry into such practices was desirable. But the place of England in this matter had heretofore been in the van—he hoped it would not hereafter be in the ruck of nations. He thought they ought to preserve upon the records of that House an emphatic declaration, although it might be of the minority, that whatever this Government or that might do, the House of Commons, as representing the nation, was determined not to endorse a policy which he believed to be as contrary to the true principles of International Law as it was certainly repugnant to the cherished traditions of the British people.

MR. RITCHIE said, he could assure the House that no dictates of Party feeling or Party allegiance would influence him on a question of so much national importance. He confessed he was somewhat surprised at the law as laid down by the Attorney General. He had a somewhat difficult task to perform, because there could be little doubt after the hon. and learned Gentleman's explanation that he with others was responsible for that Circular, and it was difficult for him to vindicate the first as well as the second Circular. If, however, the law on the subject had been laid down correctly in the first Circular, no stronger reason could be given for the necessity of a change in the law. The first Circular was, however, dead and buried, and it was to the second Circular that the House had to address itself. The great question before the House was, not whether we were to give every facility for setting fugitive slaves free, but what was the best way of doing it; and he did not think there was a great deal of difference in that respect between the Motion and the Amendment. The Government, seeing the different views taken by the legal authorities on the subject as to the state of the law, had taken a wise course in issuing a Commission composed of so many eminent men. The exact state of the law would in this way be ascertained; and as soon as the Government received the Report of the Commission they would direct their attention to the law relating to fugitive slaves, so as to make it agreeable to the feelings of the English people. He had come down to that House perfectly unbiassed as to the vote he should give; and, while he wished to state that he should not give his vote for Party purposes, yet, seeing that there was a conflict of opinion, and that the Government had appointed a Commission, he should vote with the Government in order that the law might be put on a satisfactory footing, with such Amendments as might be necessary.

SIR HENRY JAMES: Sir, difficult as my task may be, I will endeavour to follow the example that has been set by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—I will do my best to refrain from uttering one word that shall contain in its tone any Party asperity; but the difficulty of my task results from the course taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury) and my hon. and learned Friend Her Majesty's Attorney General. But, notwithstanding the temptation, I will endeavour not to yield to it. My hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth has adverted to me personally as if I had stated that it would be an act of extradition for a captain of one of Her Majesty's vessels to remove from off his deck any person who was there, be he slave or freeman, and that he could not do so. Now, if I had said so, I should have said a very foolish thing. I never said anything of the kind; and as the hon. Member for Tamworth has fallen into the error of thinking I did, perhaps the House will allow me to read the very short sentence in which I expressed myself. What I said was this—

"Apart from the fact that the law of slavery is unknown to us as a nation, and therefore that no one can be authorized to enforce it, I say that if the Admiralty had been dealing even with a fugitive criminal it ought not to have directed and could not legally direct the captain of a Queen's vessel to hold a quasi-judicial inquiry as to the fact of a man being a criminal, and then render him on account of that crime. That is, in effect, extradition, which involves and assumes exclusive British jurisdiction and British territory."

That is what I said, and what I adhere to; but it is very different from the words suggested by the hon. Member. The hon. Member for Tamworth had, I presume, the duty committed to him of making the first answer on the part of the Government—but the course he took in his very interesting speech was not to utter one sentence in defence of the second Circular. He turned, however, to those who sit on these benches, and said—"You have done worse than Her Majesty's Government. You so hampered them and fettered them by your previous Circulars and despatches that they were bound to issue this Circular." I am unwilling to reply to this complete tu quoque argument; but what did my hon. Friend refer to? He referred to a letter of Lord Palmerston, in 1836, as to the conduct of Lieutenant Jenkin. In that case Lieutenant Jenkin had not received a fugitive slave—he had discovered a stow-away on board his vessel, and he said—"I never received you; you must leave this ship;" and the course which Lord Palmerston took would be approved by most Ministers of the day. With that exception there is not one single document to be found supporting the policy of this Circular, until we come to the Instructions of Lord Clarendon in 1870. I am not going to defend that Circular—I think it wrong; but I should like to ask the hon. Member for Tamworth does he think it right or wrong? If he thinks it right, why does he attack Her Majesty's late Ministers for having issued it? If he thinks it wrong, why does he not join with us in voting for the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford? The Resolution asks that all Circulars that contain anything opposed to the principle it laid down should be withdrawn. I admit that Lord Clarendon's Instructions are not in accordance with that principle; and I therefore claim the vote of the hon. Member in support of the Resolution. I am not about to discuss the weight of one Circular against the other; but I wish to say that there is this broad difference between the errors in Lord Clarendon's Circular and the errors in this—the present is a declaration of national policy published to the world after much consideration on the part of the Government, and after much caution given to them by the public feeling of this country. The Instructions of Lord Clarendon, I have authority for saying, were seen by no Law Officers of the Crown, and they were, I have reason to believe, issued without the knowledge of any Member of the Government to which Lord Clarendon belonged. Another argument which has been used as an attack on the late Government by the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) is this—He asked the Liberal Party how they could make any complaint when they themselves passed the Act of 1873, which repealed some of the provisions of a previous Act which had been favourable to the slaves? Now, Sir, I read the statute of 1873 very differently. Every useful provision of the earlier Act was renewed in the Act of 1873, for which many who have now cheered the hon. Member for Tamworth were responsible as Members of the Parliament which passed it. Why did not some of the Members of the present Government, severe critics as they are of the acts of their Predecessors, come forward on that occasion as guardians of the interests of the slave? I now come to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and I admit that I have great difficulty in dealing with that speech, and he knows better than any one why I have that difficulty. I think no Member of this House who saw my hon. and learned Friend take the course he did, accepting the full responsibility, and more, probably, than the amount of responsibility, which ought to fall upon his shoulders, could help feeling sympathy with him in the manly course he took. But I think he will expect that some of us should take notice of his speech. The Attorney General, speaking to some extent on the part of the Government, declares now, in words the weight and authority of which will be recognized, that in his opinion he still believes that an English ship of war going into the port of a foreign State is subject to the local laws and jurisdiction of that State. That is still the opinion of Her Majesty's principal Law Adviser, and he argues the point with some ingenuity.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I did not exactly say that. I said it was a doubtful point; but, admitting that it is so, I do not see that the consequences alleged would follow.

SIR HENRY JAMES: I am sorry that the Attorney General cannot now even come to a decision one way or the other. My hon. and learned Friend did say this—that he believed it was a correct assertion of principle that if one of the Queen's ships received on the high seas a slave on board, when that vessel came into the territorial waters of the State, it was subject to the law of that State, and that the slave ought to be surrendered. Now, how am I to deal with that argument? It is mere student's exercise to discuss with my hon. and learned Friend whether he be right as regards the first Circular. I did not come here to discuss that Circular at all. I wished that Circular to be forgotten, and even forgiven, as it had been withdrawn. But I have a double reason for not discussing it. It is not with me that my hon. and learned Friend must settle this question—it is with the Lord Chancellor and the Prime Minister. May I remind my hon. and learned Friend of the words of Lord Derby. On the first night of the Session Lord Derby said the Government suspended the first Circular, and subsequently withdrew it, because the opinion of the Lord Chancellor led them to believe that in the matter they had probably been wrongly, or, at any rate, doubtfully advised, and the Lord Chancellor entertained great doubts as to the soundness of the law laid down by the Law Advisers of the Crown; and this being so, the Government were not prepared, he said, to submit to the consequences of holding an untenable position. The Prime Minister also said that the Government were responsible for the first Circular, the country had condoned it, and that, in his opinion, the second Circular was a much more fitting subject for our consideration. Now, that is my opinion also, and it will, no doubt, be the opinion of the House. The Attorney General led the House rather to believe that the first Circular had been superseded because it was badly drafted, and the second therefore substituted for it. But the second Circular is a contradiction of the first. If, as the Attorney General contends, the first Circular correctly describes the rules of International Law, then the second involves a gross and flagrant breach of our international obligations. What I say is, that the second Circular contains an acceptance of obligations in favour of slavery which we are not called upon to fulfil, and which I think, therefore, ought to be withdrawn. I am sure the House will wish to avoid, as much as possible, any technical and legal discussion; but it is necessary to know what our international obligations are, and if it be found that there is within this Circular that which there ought not to be, then I am sure every single Member of this House will wish to see it withdrawn. But, in dealing with this as a question of policy, and not of law, it is necessary to consider what our international obligations are. I will not enter into the discussion of the question of extra-territoriality. I assume that it is established and admitted by Her Majesty's Government. The first Circular denied the extra-territoriality, but the second Circular asserts it, by instructing the captains of vessels very carefully to guard their immunity from local jurisdiction. On the other hand, I frankly say that there has been some misapprehension as to what extra-territoriality means. I do not mean for one moment, in alleging this extra-territoriality, to assert that British vessels can do as they like in foreign waters. They are perfectly exempt from local jurisdiction: no process can enter upon the vessel; no law can affect them against their will—but that extra-territoriality is, without doubt, subject to qualifications and conditions. Those on board a Queen's ship in entering upon foreign waters go there upon certain terms. They must do nothing to violate the laws of the place; and not only must they not commit any act in violation of the law of the place, but I admit that that qualification ought to be construed liberally in favour of the receiving State. Therefore, if a British captain going into a foreign port announced that his vessel had come there to receive slaves, come as many as thought proper; although in one sense that would be a passive reception of the slaves, yet I think it would be in violation of the law of the State. There is also another qualification of extra-territoriality—something which courtesy exacts which is not an international obligation. We are not called upon to enforce the law of the place—that is something undefined—something to be left to discretion—a courtesy, not an international obligation. There was a want of this discrimination on the part of the Attorney General, in arguing as he did in relation to the position of criminals. If the local authorities, as a matter of courtesy, ask a captain to assist them in enforcing justice or maintaining morality, the captain may comply with the request. In our own waters, for instance, if a murderer took refuge on board a foreign vessel no process could issue to remove the criminal, because the ship is exempt from our jurisdiction; the natural course would be to apply to the captain, and to ask him to do what was right by clearing his vessel of such a person. But this is not an international obligation—it is courtesy in relation to a matter in which the captain may exercise his discretion. The question, therefore, resolves itself, on examining the Circular, into a very narrow question indeed: but to lead to it we must come to the conclusion that the courtesy of which I have spoken, whilst it may cast on us the not unnatural obligation of assisting the authorities of a State to carry out the law which all nations will allow to be right and good, we can never be asked to enforce a law which is abhorrent to our nature and adverse to our institutions. We can never by courtesy be called upon to enforce such a law. If this was a law of human sacrifices instead of slavery—a law under which a widow was burned because her husband was dead, and a demand was made on a captain to give up a woman who had escaped from such a fate, I hope every captain in Her Majesty's Navy would say—"I will enforce no such law, because it is an unnatural law." I hope the House will see that no inconvenience can result from this that a captain, as complete governor of his own vessel, can receive whom he likes, can refuse to receive whom he likes, and can get rid of whom he likes. There is no claim upon him by which he is bound to receive a fugitive slave; he ought to exercise his own discretion. On the other hand, there is no obligation to remove one—he ought to exercise his discretion. I submit that the duty of a captain is to receive a slave and freeman alike, or to get rid of a slave and freeman alike, unless particular consequences would result to the slave which would render it a more serious matter to remove him. All, therefore, that is asked by those who are supporting the withdrawal of the Circular is, not that we should do anything to violate the law of slavery, but simply that we should not be called upon to support that law. Can exception be taken to the proposition? Are we out of courtesy to carry the slave law into effect with all its peculiarities in different States, after all we have done, after the proclamation we have made to the world that this is a law against which we are warring, and for the extermination of which we have spent much treasure and life? Can we be asked to enforce the law by virtue merely of the courteous obligation to do that which is right to a foreign State? Let me point out where the second Circular errs against the proposition I have laid down. The effect of the first paragraph must be that the captain of a vessel on the high seas has to exercise particular caution in respect to him compared with what he exercises in receiving a free man. Why should he? On the high seas a vessel can know no obligation springing from International Law or courtesy to a slave-owning. Why, when on the high seas, are we to recognize the law of slavery in some far-off State, and say because an applicant for reception on board is the subject of a slave-owning State the greater caution is to be exercised in receiving him? The result of carrying this out will be that if two men are found in a water-logged vessel or raft on the high seas, the captain will tell the one who says he is a slave that he is near enough to land, and he cannot take him on board; but his companion who says he is a slaveowner will be readily received on board. Thus a practical recognition of slavery is made in a place where we ought not to notice it. Turn to the second paragraph—which is, perhaps, more important. It says—

“If while your ship is within the territorial waters of a State where slavery exists a person professing or appearing to be a fugitive slave seeks admission into your ship, you will not admit him unless his life would be in danger if he were not received on board.”

Is not that the same principle of enforcing the law of slavery, giving effect to it by making a distinction between the slave and the free man? I do not ask that the one shall be received on account of his slavery; I only ask that he shall not be sent away on that account. But you put him in a worse position than a freeman or even a criminal, and say he shall not be received unless his life is in danger. If I were asked, Does the second Circular contain any bad law? I should say I cannot tell—not because I doubt what the law is, but because I do not know whether this Circular contains any law at all. It seems to have been drawn by or under the sanction of the Lord Chancellor voluntarily, without any legal obligation. Then we have to discuss this as a question of policy. If it be not an obligation, the noble and learned Lord has drifted into a false position by way of apology, and to escape condemnation for the first Circular. Can the Government, and do they wish to, accept this as their policy? Unless, indeed, they feel that it is exacted from them; and when the matter is fairly discussed, we cannot find that there is any obligation on them. If this be matter of policy, there are one or two considerations to which I wish to refer. Some may ask the very natural question—what ought the captain to do when a slave appeals to him to be allowed to come or to remain on board? I would give him some such directions as this—

“The captains of such of Her Majesty's ships as visit foreign ports or places are to take special care to avoid causing offence to the authorities or the inhabitants, and they are to cause all under their orders to show due deference to the established rights, ceremonies, customs, and regulations of such places, and conciliate as far as possible the goodwill and respect of the inhabitants.”

That is the regulation now given to every captain, under which the right hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) and every other captain has had no difficulty in dealing with this question. If further direction is sought, it is not unimportant to know what are the directions given in respect to political refugees; and it is astonishing to find with how much greater consideration we treat the political offender than the slave. This is the direction now in existence to captains of vessels relating to political refugees in consequence of political disturbances or popular movements—

“Refuge may be afforded to persons flying from imminent personal danger. In such cases care must be taken that refugees do not carry on from Her Majesty's ships correspondence with their partizans, and the earliest opportunity must be taken to transfer them to some place of safety.”

Whilst, therefore, you may receive on board the refugee who may have committed some crime, the slave is not to be received unless his life is in danger; and while the refugee is to be taken to a place of personal safety, the slave is to be sent back, the moment he has escaped the personal danger, to the shore where his owner is. If the Government only treated the fugitive slave as they treat the political refugee there would be no complaint. Although in the second Circular there is nothing said about surrender, but only that the slave is to be put on shore, that may be a very different thing as to our legal responsibility, but it is very much the same thing to the slave. I have shown what has been the policy in relation to the directions given to captains of the Queen's ships, and I have shown what has been our policy in regard to refugees. Even the hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Hanbury) cannot lay the blame of that direction to the Members of the late Government, for they were issued, I believe, by a former Conservative Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry), and it is one that recommends itself to the feelings of every man in this country. There have been also two or three other evidences given by this House and by former Governments in regard to the policy of surrendering fugitive slaves. The question has been but seldom before Parliament, and seldom before the Government for their decision. But in 1826, 1827, and 1828, when America felt her strength and there was a powerful party in the States in favour of slavery, it felt very strongly the necessity, in relation to their interests, that fugitive slaves who escaped into Canada should be rendered up. A Motion was made and carried in the House of Representatives to that effect, directing that application should be made to this country. When that application came, although slavery existed at that time in our own Colonies, how did the Government of that day treat it? There is some interesting Correspondence to be found in our State Papers on this subject. The American Minister, writing to his Government on July 5, 1827, in reply to express directions to urge the Government of England to agree to a Treaty for rendering up fugitive slaves, said—

"Mr. Addington told me that on one point Government had come to a conclusion, and it was utterly impossible for them to agree to a stipulation for the surrender of fugitive slaves,"

In 1827 there is a similar letter, and on October 2, 1828, the American Minister writes—

"Lord Aberdeen said that in the present state of public feeling on the question, which he said might be called a mania"—

—[A laugh.]—it is a mania, Sir, which has grown chronic in this country—

The result was that the Government refused to enter into any such treaty as was asked for. Once again we have traces of the view entertained by Parliament on the subject—it was when the 15th & 16th of the Queen was passed, with the purpose of enabling the restoration of merchant seamen who had deserted from foreign ships in the ports of this country. It was then enacted that when it should appear to Her Majesty that due facilities would be given for apprehending seamen who had deserted from British ships in the territories of a foreign Power, Her Majesty might, by Order in Council, declare that seamen, not being slaves, who had deserted from the merchantmen of a subject of that Power in the territories of Her Majesty or of the East India Company might be lawfully apprehended and carried on board their respective ships. Let the House observe—"seamen, not being slaves." However undeserving they might be, if slaves, we refused to allow their apprehension. I cannot part from this question without considering why we are asked to delay in withdrawing this Circular. The hon. Member for Tamworth, without supporting the Circular, pleaded for delay. On what grounds? He asks for the delay in order that we may obtain information from the Report of the Royal Commission as to the Instructions from time to time issued to British naval officers. In the first place, allow me to inquire who is it asks for information about those Instructions? Why, it appears that Sir Leopold Heath is the only person who has asked for that information; and we are now appealed to for delay on the ground that that very person—Sir Leopold Heath—who is in want of information, should sit upon a Commission to instruct the House and the Government upon the points contained in the Amendment of my hon. Friend. And yet it appears that the only person who wants information can tell us, without going on the Commission, perfectly well what the law is. In the case of two slaves who came on board one of our ships, he wrote to the captain of the ship as follows:—

"With respect to the demand made by the Government of Madagascar for the restoration of the slaves untruly said to have been carried off by force, and which, I presume, will stand good as to the two men in question, I suggest that you should point out to that Government that every man putting his foot upon English soil becomes ipso facto free, and that the deck of a British man-of-war is held constructively to be British territory, and, therefore, these men cannot be restored to their masters."

He adds that—

"As England wages war against the Slave Trade only, and does not as yet pretend to interfere with the status of domestic slavery, it is possible that the English Government may, upon your application, grant compensation to the former owners of those two men."

That is the view of Sir Leopold Heath, the only demandant of information, who is to be put on a Commission to instruct Her Majesty's Government on a point of policy, or to reconcile the different opinions of the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers of the Crown. Sir, whilst there may be many questions involved in this discussion, there is but one practical question to be determined by this vote. It is whether this proposition is to be accepted by Her Majesty's Government, without triumph to a Party or humiliation to them, now, or when the Royal Commission has reported. It is whether they will withdraw the Circular now, if there be any doubt on the law, so that there shall be no chance of any injustice being done to the slave, and leave it to be re-issued if right and necessary when the Commission has reported. Whether they do it now, or when the Royal Commission has reported, the result must be the same. There can be but one result. The right hon. Gentleman may have what advice he will. The Cabinet may counsel him, and the Law Officers give him assistance on points of law. He may use the great influence of his voice in this House to-night; his bidding may be done in the Lobby, and a majority may be obtained to him; the Royal Commission may report as it will—but this Circular from this moment is dead. A power greater than his has decreed it—a power from which there is no appeal. A freedom-loving people, moved by their instincts, following their traditions and the history of their race, have uttered this simple decree and judgment—that beneath their country's flag no slave can there be, nor shall any man be compelled to surrender his fellow-being to another.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the eloquent speech that had just been addressed to them by the hon. and learned Gentleman was one that did credit alike to his intellect and to the feeling which he had no doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman shared with the great majority of that House. Her Majesty's Government was not there to-night to contend that a certain practice was most consistent with their own feelings, but that the second Slave Circular was not contrary to the law. The hon. and learned Gentleman himself had hesitated to say that that Circular was not in conformity with the law. The hon. and learned Gentleman told them that Sir Leopold Heath had laid down the law for them in the letter which he had read; but he had also told them that when Sir Leopold Heath had carried away the two slaves upon the occasion referred to on the ground that the slave that set his foot upon the deck of a British ship became at once free, he had advised that the country was bound in honour to pay compensation to the owners of the slaves so carried away. Compensation for what? If these men were already free, they had a right to freedom; and why was this country bound to compensate their former owners? To a great extent, he did not dispute the law laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He was not going to dispute the fact that we had laid down the rule that a public ship was, to a large extent, extra-territorial, but that rule required to be carefully guarded. He scarcely thought that the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) would assent to the doctrine that had gained currency out-of-doors, that the extra-territoriality of a ship made her part of her country, and that wherever she went she carried her own laws and obligations with her, and was not subjected to the jurisdiction of any other State. It was impossible that that could be true to its fullest extent, because in matters of customs and quarantine she yielded to foreign jurisdiction. Suppose that two natives of the State in which the ship was quarrelled on board, what would have taken place if one killed the other? Would it be competent to bring the survivor home and try him here? He should like to know also whether in the event of a child the offspring of a foreigner being born on board one of our ships in a foreign port that child was entitled to the privileges of a native of this country? If not, the extra-territoriality of a ship was not so large as it had been stated to be. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who had roared like a lion at Bradford, had spoken like a lamb in that House. And whilst they were constantly being told that that was not a Party question, he should like to ask some of his independent Friends below the Gangway whether they had received one of those Circulars from the other side of the House which should have been addressed to them all if that were truly not a Party question; and besides, he was told that the independent Members upon whose votes they relied had been altogether neglected. The hon. Member who had brought forward this Motion had said that Her Majesty's Government ought to lay down some clear rule on this subject; but he should like to know whether his Motion laid down any very clear rule with regard to it. The rule that the hon. Member laid down was a discretionary one only, and what was a discretionary rule when it came to be examined? The right hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) had told them that he could not help thinking that whenever a slave set his foot on board a British man-of-war he should be treated as free, but that we should take care that a slave never did set his foot on one; and the right hon. and gallant Baronet had also told them that when he was in command of a ship his men were in such admirable discipline that the case of a fugitive slave getting on board was unknown, and that if his officers had allowed such an occurrence they ought to have been tried by Court-martial. In Brazil our ships were supplied by boats manned by domestic slaves; suppose when those slaves in numbers were on board, his right hon. and gallant Friend suddenly turned round to them and said—"Here is a ship of war belonging to England, and if you wish to escape from your masters here is a means of escape," because it had been argued by a great many people that that might fairly be done. Could that be done with any sense of honour or dignity on the part of the British nation? His hon. Friend the Member for Bedford said the House was to say that there should be no foreign jurisdiction for our vessels, and he wanted that to be said by this Motion. Now, that was a thing that could not be done by a Motion, nor could it be done by an Act of Parliament. His hon. and learned Friend who had just spoken (Sir Henry James) had told the House that if the first Circular were law the mere withdrawal of that Circular would not in any sense free us from responsibility. If any nation said that was the law we should be bound to act upon it. So also if this second Circular were law we should be bound to act upon it. But they could not by Motions in the House of Commons or by Resolutions affect foreign countries. They might say by a Motion that this or that should be done; but foreign States would say—"You gave us fair notice that you were not going to do this, and we shall deprive you of the privileges you now enjoy." He believed it was by a tacit understanding that where a State admitted a man-of-war belonging to another State into her waters that man-of-war was to demean itself in a friendly manner, and in that way be admitted to the advantages of extra-territoriality, just as the privileges attached to an Ambassador's house might depend on the friendly demeanour of the Ambassador. As he happened to mention an Ambassador's house he wished to say one word as to political refugees, because a good deal had been said upon that subject. In a letter written by Lord Clarendon in 1870—and let it not be supposed that he brought in the name of Lord Clarendon specially with any view to discredit him, because Lord Clarendon was just as averse to slavery and the slave trade as any one then present—the noble Lord said to one of our Representatives in the United States that he was correct in informing Mr. Fish that the Representatives of Great Britain were instructed that the practice of granting an asylum to political refugees was highly objectionable, inasmuch as it involved diplomats in disagreeable discussions. Lord Clarendon said that those instructions must be strictly adhered to, but that some discretion must be left to Her Majesty's Consuls where lives could be saved not only at the moment, but by giving time for reflection to the victorious party. He (Mr. Hardy) hoped in a short time to show that the Government, in dealing with this subject, had acted in accordance with the spirit of those instructions. His hon. and learned Friend had called their attention to a particular part of the Slave Instructions on which he (Mr. Hardy) could not then put his hand. No doubt, his hon. and learned Friend was accurate in his statement of that part of the instructions. But it must be remembered that the Slave Instructions which were sent out in 1865 were most carefully prepared by the President of the Committee, to whom the matter was referred—namely, Dr. Lushington, and no man was more adverse than Dr. Lushington—clarum et venerabile nomen, to the slave trade. But those instructions said something about domestic slavery. The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) said we never recognized slavery at all. The hon. Member must have confined his reading within very narrow limits. What were all their Treaties? They had an Act of Parliament—6 & 7 Vict.—laying down regulations as to the sale and transfer of slaves, except in certain places which were prohibited. How could that be done if slavery was not recognized where that took place? The hon. Member said they were not to recognize domestic slavery, but what said the instructions of Dr. Lushington, No. 394?

"You will impress upon the Natives the earnest desire of Great Britain for the improvement of their condition, and will clearly point out the distinction between the export of slaves, which Great Britain is determined to put down, and the system of domestic slavery, with which she does not claim to interfere."

And not only that, when they came to look at the proceedings of the Foreign Office Committee in a Parliamentary Paper presented in 1871, they would find there instructions as to the traffic in domestic slaves—what was called the legal traffic within the country and within the waters of the country, so constantly brought into communication with our ships of war—and as to what was called the illegal slave trade proper, which they were engaged in putting down. And, therefore, for any one to assert that they did not recognize domestic slavery was one of the most extraordinary statements he ever heard. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) had been taunted with having said something about difficulties which had arisen. They were told that because only one naval officer had applied for instruction no difficulties had arisen. He thought he might call attention to the case of the Thetis, which occurred the year before last, in which this country had to pay £20,000 damages for having seized slaves improperly. [An hon. MEMBER: Not fugitive slaves.] He did not say that they were fugitive slaves. But he said this—that when hon. Members said that when a slave was once admitted to the protection of the British flag he should be treated as if he were free, and not ordered to leave the ship and return to slavery, they must not look to fugitive slaves only, but to all slaves who might come under the protection of the British flag. He would refer hon. Members to the Act of 1873, which applied to the restoration of slaves, and not simply to the receiving them; and he would admit that they were in a certain sense responsible for that Act. It was called a consolidation of the Slave Trade Act, and passed without a word of comment in either House of Parliament. That Act of Parliament remained untouched by their Resolution. They were bound by that Act to restore the slave. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) shook his head; but the words of the Act said that the Courts should have jurisdiction to try, condemn, and restore any vessel, "slave," goods, or effects alleged to be seized, detained, or forfeited in accordance with its provisions, and, besides restoring them, likewise to give damages. Well, when they had adopted the Resolution now before them, what would they have done to touch such an Act as they themselves had passed? Those who now called on them to restore no one on the ground of slavery had so far recognized slavery that they had in the first instance made it legal in certain places for British subjects to sell and transfer slaves, and then they called on their officers, though they had admitted to the protection of the British flag slaves who might be as eager for freedom as any fugitive, to restore them to their masters. He heard an hon. Gentleman say, "May give up," but there was no "may" in the matter. The jurisdiction of the Court, according to their own Act, would compel them to restore the slave to his master. The Government stood there to maintain the law which hon. Gentlemen opposite had made. Those on his side admitted that they should have looked more closely to that Act when it was being passed. Unfortunately they did not do so, any more than they did into the Acts relating to political refugees; but the fault was not theirs alone. Those very Acts were helped to be passed by those who were now banded together to insist that no person should be surrendered on the ground of slavery, although the very opposite to that was laid down in their own Act. There might be cases in which the high seas were so near the territorial waters of slave-holding States as to bring us in contact with slavery in their territories; and, it becoming important that we should not come into collision with those nations, instructions were issued enjoining the observance of special care in regard to taking those people on board of our ships. Now, the Government had been told to deal with that matter openly. Well, that was what they had been doing. If, instead of keeping back from the knowledge of the English people what was going on; if, instead of those secret instructions which had been given in past years, open instructions had been issued; if hon. Gentlemen opposite had then avowed the sentiments which they avowed to-day, and when the Act of 1873 was passing had declared that they were to take a new point of departure and to make fresh progress in the direction of freedom, there might have been much to be said in favour of that course. But they had not done that, and even now some of them asked why the Government had revealed to the country what things were happening and why they were told of such a dreadful case as that of a slave having to be restored, though he got on board one of our ships, under an order from this country, not merely that they might remove him, but deliver him, to use the words of one of those Circulars—"into the hands of his lawful owner." Then the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite said they should revert to what existed before the present Circular. To what were they to revert? Why, to those hidden proceedings which they wished they had known before in order that they might have condemned them earlier. And they declared that the country was awake to a sense of the enormity committed by the Government in putting forward a Circular that was infinitely more favourable to the slave than those former secret instructions. Again, it was said, who asked for these Circulars. He would tell them. In the first place, they were asked for by a naval officer in command of a district where it was of the utmost importance that definite rules should be in force. The rules were not framed only because they were brought into contact with the slave trade, but also because they were brought into contact with domestic slavery, which they had engaged by Treaty to respect. Moreover, those rules were made in conformity with those Treaties which enabled them to hunt down the slave trade in certain territorial waters; and without those Treaties they would have no right or authority to enter those territorial waters and suppress the slave trade. The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) told them that Lord Clarendon had laid down the right principle in 1856 in regard to Brazil; but it should be remembered that the Brazilian Government proved faithless to its Treaties with us, and we went into their waters in spite of them, because they had not kept their engagements. In consequence of that, Lord Clarendon laid down a broader rule in their case than was afterwards adopted in others. In State Paper No. 18, among the documents now on the Table, the House would find it stated that the attention of the Lords of the Admiralty had been called to the serious irregularities and mistakes committed by our naval commanders, employed in the suppression of the slave trade, on the East Coast of Africa. Their Lordships, therefore, issued certain orders in which they told those officers that the slave trade must be carefully distinguished from slavery, with which latter institution in foreign States or in foreign ships not in British territorial waters we did not claim, either by Treaty or otherwise, to interfere. Thus, the Admiralty had thought it necessary to interfere in 1869, although they had issued instructions only in 1865. Coming to the Slave Trade papers presented to this House, he found that complications having arisen in the Persian Gulf, the Indian Government—that was to say, the Viceroy in Council—which included some very distinguished men, and at least one eminent lawyer, issued provisional orders to the effect that in foreign territorial waters slaves were to be given up to their lawful owners or to the proper authorities on demand. Those orders were far more strict than anything which had gone before, and ten times more so than those of the second Circular. In the face of all those things, they said—"Take all these things away—abolish all these regulations and leave men to their own discretion." Well, the discretion of Captain Sullivan led to a threat of a court martial; and, in fact, to a court of inquiry and censure, and unlimited discretion in such cases seemed to go along with unlimited liability. When he first considered this Circular he naturally looked about for instruction on the subject which might afford him some light on the matter. Knowing comparatively little of International Law, he naturally turned to where he could get it in its briefest shape, and he found it in The Times newspaper in a letter signed by "Historicus," a gentleman who was well known to be a lawyer of such eminence that it was not unlikely in the course of events that he should some day be one of the chief Law Officers of the Crown. In the second Circular it was stated that the Government were desirous by every means in their power to meet or mitigate the evils of slavery. They were told they had just done the reverse; but their object was certainly to maintain the right of personal liberty, and if the proposed Commission showed how personal liberty could be extended with honour to this country they would certainly be carrying out the intentions of the Government. Well, what did that excellent letter say?—

"Are public ships to go about to foreign ports and then, having accepted their hospitality, to render themselves public nuisances? Certainly not. A captain should not make his ship a receiving-house for fugitive slaves any more than for runaway criminals, smugglers, or"—would the House believe it—"stolen goods."

He (Mr. Hardy) was perfectly horrified at the comparison; but it only showed how strongly the writer himself felt on the subject. Then he went on to say—

"Instead of ordering the slaves to be surrendered after they had been received, the direction should have been not to receive them, because they could not be surrendered."

That was what "Historicus," with his profound legal knowledge, had to tell them. Officers were not to receive slaves at all, or they would get into difficulties—in fact, they were to regard them with as much abhorrence as they would stolen property. The letter continued—

"The captain has the entire right to determine whom he will receive or exclude or remove."

What was this question of removing? The hon. Member for Bedford said—

"You admit a man in danger, and when the danger is past you are not to let him continue on board. You treat him as a slave, and turn him out on the ground of slavery." To that he would answer, that they did neither the one thing nor the other. They said, If the man appeared to be a fugitive slave—the Circular only referred to slaves, but it might in the same way have referred to criminals or even to stolen goods—he was not to be taken on board if it could be helped, unless he was manifestly in danger of his life. Then as to the danger being past and the permission to continue, they had the captain's discretion. But, it was said, the moment they came to the question of the captain's discretion, "Oh, you bind him hard and fast with regulations and compel him to give the man up." What they did was to receive a man who was in imminent danger of life, whatever he might be, but they declared the ship was not sent to the place for the purpose of taking people on board who were flying from the territory of a country with which they were at peace. He should like to know what a ship, it might be with a special and urgent mission to perform, would do with a number of escaped slaves on board. Were they to bring them to England? Were they to treat them differently from all other human beings? Or, were they to take them and drop them down in some desolate place, as in South Africa, where they would be in greater misery? It was a disgrace to the country to pretend to rescue men from slavery and then place them in a position of greater helplessness and misery. The instruction not to admit any man on board whose reception there was reason to think would give offence to the authorities of the place where he resided was sound law, and it was according to the comity of nations as generally understood. But they were told they ought not to give definite instructions; and it was said—"Were naval officers to go about the world in the responsible position of the representative of the Sovereign not knowing whether they possessed that immunity from foreign law which every English man-of-war had always enjoyed, and which every English captain had always believed till now he was entitled to claim?" There had been a great deal of enlightenment thrown on that point since this was written. Then it was said—"If there ever was a question on which an English Government was bound to know its mind and give the officers of the Queen definite instructions for their conduct, this is that subject." They were told to give definite instructions, and now that they had done that, they were told that they ought not to have issued any instructions. Again, it was said that, "on the whole, the writer saw no other road out of the embarrassment in which the Navy and nation are involved, except by putting out fresh instructions, which shall be set forth on principles exactly the opposite to those on which the Circular is founded." He had not attempted to defend the first Circular, and he was glad that there had been no attempt on the part of any speaker to throw discredit on any part of the House as not having the abolition of slavery at heart, and he could not understand that the status of a person was altered by being received for a short time on board a British ship; and in the case of the negress who came from Antigua and remained in this country, and when she went back claimed to be set free in consequence, Lord Stowell said she was in a parenthesis whilst she was in England. His earliest recollections were associated with the name of Mr. Wilberforce. He was an intimate friend of his (Mr. Hardy's) family, and much connected with them, and from his earliest childhood the great work in which Wilberforce was engaged was constantly impressed on his mind. No man in that House had a greater abhorrence of slavery or the necessary consequences resulting from it than he had. He did not believe that there could be absolute power on the part of one man, slavery on the part of another, without equal degradation to both, and that such a position of things was calculated to bring ruin on a country. He looked upon what this country had done in regard to the abolition of slavery as calculated to bring a blessing down upon it, and that it was more to its credit than any of the great victories which it had achieved in all parts of the world. He believed that great act of self-denial, by which England emancipated her slaves would never be forgotten, but would be written in records more imperishable than any part of her history. Although he quite admitted that the putting an end to slavery would be the best thing to do if that could be effected, yet when they saw that that could not be done without a resort to violence, which would be unacceptable to the world at large, they were bound to use such means as they could in order that they might induce others to assist them in attaining the object which they had in view. Such was the course of Lord Palmerston—no friend to slavery—but agreeing to suffer it that he might more effectually cut off the sources that supplied it. He believed the victory it had gained over itself, and the enormous sum it had paid to secure the emancipation of the slave, stood forth as an act of justice never to be forgotten in the history of this country, but would be recorded in its honour when some of its greatest deeds of arms would be forgotten. But when that great sum was paid it was paid on the principle of doing justice, on the principle that when you had acknowledged the right you ought not to interfere with that right without giving compensation for its destruction. That being so in the case of our attempt to put down the slave trade, having acknowledged domestic slavery as an institution in those countries with which we have Treaty obligations, we were bound by the contract into which we had entered. Those Treaties were entered into because that by conciliatory proceedings we were enabled to obtain access into the territorial waters of those States, by which we were enabled to cut off the springs of the slave traffic, thereby doing our best to dry up slavery itself. They were bound by every means in their power to put down slavery; but when they could not do that without violence and outrage upon the rights of other nations they were bound to use every possible means to induce other people to assist them. He therefore still thought they would find the Treaties into which they had entered would be of the greatest possible advantage to this country in that respect. They had the evidence of Captain

Colomb before the East African Slave Committee, that they afforded us the best possible access to those places where slavery prevailed. They must bear in mind that England was bound by the comity of nations, that although they might possibly in their strength trample upon weak Powers, there were others looking on who might perhaps, when our time of weakness arrived, apply the very same principles to us. If our ships of war went into foreign ports and became receptacles for criminals and other offenders against the law of those countries, ships of war might also come into our ports and carry away deserters from our Army and Navy, and other offenders against the law; and he knew but little of the spirit of the English people if such things were to happen if they would not assert what they deemed to be their rights. Let the House bear in mind how short a time had elapsed since England herself was a slave-holding country, and since that great country at the other side of the Atlantic was crowded with slaves. Let us remember what we had then submitted to, and how we were obliged to keep our ships of war out of the ports of the United States for fear slaves should get on board them and that we should in consequence be brought into difficulties and complications with that great Power. Let us recollect when negroes, themselves British subjects, were taken out of our ships which had gone into the port of Charleston—British ships with British men on board them—and put in prison during their stay there, while England stood by and offered no resistance. We had to submit to that which was the lex loci, and were we now, he would ask, prepared with a high hand to break through Treaties and international engagements? If England was great in her mercy, should she not also be great in her honour and her truthfulness? He was sorry to have detained the House so long? There were many things more which he would wish to have said on the subject; but he was desirous not to trespass unduly upon their attention. He might, however, be permitted to observe with respect to the Commission, which, it was said, was merely an excuse for evasion and delay, that we had had more than one Committee and Commission on the subjects before. Let any one look upon the records year after year relating to the
